out of the whole cotton material, and this is one method looked upon favorably by some. Another method is to saponify the oils in the process and recover the soap which could be recovered as cottonseed oil. It is impossible to determine accurately which method is the better and most economical unless larger-scale experiments can be made.

One large phase of this investigation has been the growth and development of the cotton plant. Different varieties of cotton give different yields of cellulose per pound of raw material. Also, different varieties give a wide difference in number of pounds of cellulose obtained per acre of cotton. Therefore, the best variety of cotton for the production of cellulose must be found.

In the harvesting of the cotton plant, the experiments so far conducted indicate that the plant should be harvested with a revamped combine which would cut the entire plant down and bale it as the machine moves along and never allow the plant to hit the ground to pick up dirt and sand. In the experiments made the plant was cut by hand on a small scale, stacked in the field to dry, and then baled in a regular cotton-gin press in the regular size cotton bale. Each bale weighed approximately 600 pounds. Further experiments were conducted which indicated that the regular hay baler made the most durable and economic bales.

According to the United States Department of Commerce, imports for 11 months ending November 1, 1934, of pulp and pulp woods were as follows:

Pulp woods imported_____ _____cords__ 928, 998 _tons avoirdupois__ 1, 472, 341 imported. Dollar value of pulp imports above, $63,515,826.

The market quotations of November 1, 1934, were:

Bleached sulfite pulp cellulose_____ton_ $57.11 Bleached sulfate pulp cellulose_____do__ 47.73

From the information thus far given you, it may be easily seen that this investigation is not complete. It has only really started. But the results so far obtained are so promising and are of such a wide-spread interest and possible source of rich profits for the South, it is very apparent that it would be wise to continue and properly work out all the technical and economic problems connected therewith.

I have in my office a number of pictures which more graphically present the idea of harvesting whole cotton, showing the harvested products in bales, and so forth, which, I am sure, will prove very interesting to Members if they will take the time to call by my office and look them over. I have, also, been supplied with a cabinet containing test tubes filled with samples of the products of the whole cotton in its various stages from the actual cotton stalk into a shredded form, partly cooked, partly bleached, and finally to the cellulose obtained. This cabinet contains 20 test tubes which also would be of great interest to each Member of the House. I should be delighted to have you visit me so that I can show you just what has been done and the great possibility of what can be done. I have received numerous letters already since introducing this bill from chemists and research directors of agricultural colleges commending very highly this legislation.

In closing, I want to extend my deepest appreciation to the Dockery Bros., of Rockingham, N. C., and Dr. Cameron, of the University of North Carolina, for the splendid progress they have made, information given me, and their keen interest in this proposition which, to my mind, if given proper attenton and proper financing, will result in untold benefits to the cotton industry of the South and the country as a whole.

THE CRIME PROBLEM IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to exteind my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to exof methods have been tested. It is possible to gin the seed | tend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Congressman Jennings Randolph, Chairman of the Special House Committee Investigating Crime Conditions in the District of Columbia. Delivered at Station WJSV, Columbia Broadcasting System, Washington, D. C., Saturday, February 23, 1935.

Of the complex problems confronting the American people today, none transcends in seriousness the problem of crime.

In its menace to the security of life, body, and property, law-lessness in this country constitutes a more grave situation than even our economic problem or our conflict with physical disease.

Racketeering alone extorts from the American people $15,000,000,000 annually. That stupendous sum is far in excess of the cost of maintaining our entire Federal Government, including all of its emergency and relief agencies.

For the prevention and punishment of crime, maintenance of ialls and penal institutions, loss of property by fraud or destruc-pails and penal institutions, loss of property by fraud or destruction by arson, our people spend another $13,000,000,000 annually.

Aside from this material aspect in which some $28,000,000,000 a year is squandered on lawlessness, there is appalling loss of life, destruction of physical and moral health, and tragedy beyond the power of measurement.

In the last 35 years America's annual murder rate has increased 350 percent. There are each year in the United States—to mention only some of the major crimes—12,000 murders, 3,000 kidnappings, 50,000 robberies, 100,000 assaults, 40,000 burglaries, and 5,000 cases

Our prisons are choked beyond capacity—and bear in mind that only a small percent of those who commit crime are arrested, convicted, and finally committed to prison. In the past 10 years our prison population has increased 50 percent.

Prisoners in the Federal penitentiaries convicted for violation of Prisoners in the Federal penitentiaries convicted for violation of Federal narcotic laws have become so great in number that Congress found it necessary to build two new penitentiaries, known as "drug-addict farms", to take care of the overflow of drug victims who had cluttered up the three regular penitentiaries.

In addition, the Attorney General of the United States found it necessary to acquire Alcatraz Prison in San Francisco Bay for convicts regarded as being too dangerous to confine in what were until recently considered secure penitentiaries for any type of felon

Despite the alarming increase in prison population, it is estimated that there are in the United States today more than 400,000 mated that there are in the United States today more than 400,000 persons who make their living mostly through crime, and that there are roaming at large 120,000 crimson-handed assassins.

I will not tax your patience with further statistics on our national crime situation. I have presented the foregoing in the hope of conveying to you some conception of the enormity of crime conditions throughout the 48 States of the Union.

What I want chiefly to bring to you tonight is an idea of the gravity of the crime problem here in Washington—the Nation's Capital

I should like to impress upon you the danger which lurks in the all too-popular idea that the crime situation in Washington is a thing to be accepted as inevitable. Washington's crime rate is abnormal. In all of the classifications of major crime, with the single exception of kidnaping, and this is as disgraceful as it is unpleasant to admit, the Capital City of our great Republic is one of the most crime-ridden cities in the world.

As chairman of the special committee of the House, which is seeking a solution to the crime problem here in Washington, I have had occasion to examine the official records of the police denave had occasion to examine the official records of the police department and of the district attorney's office. In making the statement that Washington is one of the most crime-ridden cities in the world, I have no desire to be sensational. The purpose of that statement is to awaken the citizens and the officials of this community from the lethargy which has permitted crime to expand to its present abnormal proportions.

During the last fiscal year, the local authorities arrested a total of more than 60,000 people in the District of Columbia. That is more than 10 percent of the total population. True, all but a but 5,000 of these 60,000 arrests were for traffic and municipal violations and for misdemeanors. The fact remains, however, that there were 5,000 arrests for felonies.

I cite the total figure to indicate the wide-spread disrespect for authority which exists among our people generally.

Of course, in any jurisdiction, only a portion of those who commit crime are arrested. A much smaller proportion are tried and convicted. The chance of escaping punishment in this jurisdiction is entirely too favorable to the criminal.

Let me cite you some figures.

In the fiscal year of 1934, Washington's crime score is as follows:

Eighty-one persons murdered; 36 persons killed through manslaughter by negligence; 289 persons assaulted with intent to kill, with dangerous weapons, etc.; 961 persons robbed; 2,638 houses and other places burglarized. And let me remind you at this point that every case of robbery and housebreaking, but for the grace of God, might have resulted in murder.

Other major crimes in the District of Columbia in this same period included the theft of 3,169 automobiles; 1,056 cases of grand larceny; and 695 miscellaneous felonies, including rape, mayhem, arson, forgery, extortion, and embezzlement.

The total felonies was 8,875.

If there are in my audience any who think that this condition of crime in Washington is not bad as compared to other cities, let me say this, that a comparison of nine cities closely approximating the population of Washington shows that for last year Washington stood second in murder, first in robbery, second in burglary, first in grand larceny, and second in auto theft.

In proportion to population Washington has 2½ times as many murders as New York and 40 percent more murders than Chicago. I realize that there are those who criticize the publication of figures of this nature because it is claimed such information is a reflection on the fair name of a community. I want to say emphatically that I, for one, have no patience with this point of view. The germ of crime, like many other germs, can be destroyed only after exposure to the light, and the most destructive light for crime bacteria is publicity.

In emphasizing this thought, I echo the sentiments of the Chief Executive of the United States. In addressing the delegates to the recent National Crime Conference in Washington, President Roosevelt said:

Roosevelt said:

"It is your positive duty to keep before the country the facts in regard to crime as a whole—great crimes, lesser crimes, and little crimes—to build up a body of public opinion which, I regret to be compelled to say, is not in this day and age sufficiently active or alive to the situation in which we find ourselves."

active or alive to the situation in which we find ourselves."

Let us, then, admit the unpleasant truth and set ourselves to the task of correcting the condition.

Referring again to the fact that there were almost 9,000 felonies committed in the District last year, the police department records some 6,000 of these cases as cleared by the arrest of about 5,000 persons. Of the number arrested, there were less than 1,250 indicted by the grand jury. What happened to the other 3,750 cases is a matter that our committee proposes to ascertain.

The investigation thus far indicates that there are far too many criminals escaping arrest and punishment. Further, there is substance for the belief that there is a woeful lack of speed in the administration of criminal justice in this jurisdiction. Nothing will so definitely discourage crime as the certainty of punishment through the speedy and impartial enforcement of the law.

The people of Washington must look to Congress for protection against the depredations of antisocial elements. Congress has charged this committee with the responsibility of finding the weaknesses in the law-enforcement machinery of the District of Columbia, and recommending such remedial action as may be necessary. necessary.

I can assure you that it is the sincere desire of every member of

I can assure you that it is the sincere desire of every member of the committee to discharge that duty to the fullest extent.

I am hopeful that the inquiry will result in a lasting solution to the problem, and, further, I am hopeful that the committee will have the courageous and determined support of the people of the District of Columbia in whose behalf our work is being conducted.

It is the patriotic duty of every American to aid in removing the stigma of crime from the Capital of our country. Its effect is not only local but reaches out to all parts of our Nation and is not only local but reaches out to all parts of our Nation and the well-being of our people.

Milwaukee, Wis., has a crime rate of 275.7 per 100,000 of population, Washington, D. C., has a crime rate of 1,152.8 per 100,000 of population.

With the aid and support of the citizens, churches, schools, and organizations in Washington, Congress can and will make the crime rate of the Nation's Capital the lowest of any city in the United States.

SECTION 824, CODE OF LAWS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 402) to amend section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended to read

District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 824. Unlawful entry on private property: Any person who, without lawful authority, shall enter, or attempt to enter, a private dwelling against the will of the lawful occupant thereof, or being therein, without lawful authority to remain therein, shall refuse to quit the same on the demand of the lawful occupant thereof; or any person who, without lawful authority, shall enter, or attempt to enter, an unoccupied private dwelling against the will or consent of the lawful owner thereof, or his duly authorized again or being therein, without lawful authority to remain therein. agent, or being therein, without lawful authority to remain therein, shall refuse to quit the same on the demand of the lawful owner thereof or his duly authorized agent, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $50 or imprisonment in the jail for not more than 6 months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 8, after the word "dwelling", insert the words "or building", and on page 2, line 3, at the beginning of the line, insert the words "or building."

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, that concludes the business

LEGISLATION FOR BLIND OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn].

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not want anybody in this House to be under the impression that I was opposed to the blind of the District of Columbia receiving a pension. I believe the blind of the District of Columbia and in every State in the Union should have an adequate pension. It is a fact, thousands of men who are blind today have lost their sight in the mills and factories and they have to pay as much for rent and other necessities as any other person who possesses sight. In fact, the expenses of a blind person are much more than those of the average person who can see.

As I stated about 2 weeks after Congress convened, a delegation of the blind of the District of Columbia came to my office and presented a bill to me to introduce for them. I told them I would present it but I would modify it. I called Mr. McIntyre at the White House to learn if the President would sign a pension bill for the blind if it were passed. He told me to contact Mr. Bell. I called Mr. Bell's office and was informed he would be away for a few days. When he returned Mr. Bell requested me to present the bill.

After I received this information then my colleague, Congressman Ellenbogen, introduced almost the identical bill. The blind people who had been in my office called Mr. Ellenbogen and asked him why he introduced their bill. I do not understand why Mr. Ellenbogen did this. He knew I was active in the affairs of the sightless. The bill which the gentleman, Mr. Ellenbogen, introduced, as I said before, is not a real pension bill. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ellenbogen] wanted to introduce a bill to help the blind, why did he not introduce a bill that was worth while?

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to state to the committee whom I believe were actuated by humanitarian motives, that I personally, in behalf of the blind of the District of Columbia, thank them for their willingness to assist them in obtaining a pension, which, in my opinion, is very much needed at the present time.

[Applause.]

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ellenbogen]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that my colleague, Mr. Dunn of Pennsylvania, has seen fit to make the remarks he has just concluded. I am certain that if the gentleman knew the facts in the case and knew the bill he is speaking about, he would not have done so. When my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. Kelly, was defeated I determined that I would present a bill that he had presented last year and that had been passed by the House. When the session began I looked over the bill, and I made a few changes, and then I introduced the bill, without having spoken to any of the blind, without having spoken to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn], or anybody else, and not knowing of the interest of Mr. Dunn.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ELLENBOGEN. At the end of my remarks I will be glad to yield.

I introduced the bill as any Member of Congress would introduce a bill on a subject in which he was interested. Had I known that my colleague, Mr. Dunn, was considering it, I would have gladly consulted him. The bill means nothing to me personally or to my district. I introduced the bill because I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is in charge of all legislation pertaining to the District of Columbia. A day or two after I had introduced the bill, the blind of the District of Columbia called me and expressed their deep gratitude to me and told me they had previously talked to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn] because he was blind, but that he had failed to introduce the bill, and they were glad I had done so because they did not like the long delay.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. In just a moment. Now, as to the bill, I wish to tell my colleague from Pennsylvania it is a better bill than was ever passed in any State of the Union. It is a much better bill than the bill passed by the State of Pennsylvania. It does not require that a blind person must be a pauper before he can obtain a pension.

It is a model bill for any State in the Union to adopt; and, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, Mr. Dunn, indicated in a discussion which I had with him that the bill was a good bill.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman say that I told him the bill was a good bill?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield. Continuing, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said he had intended to introduce such a bill; and if he had intended to introduce this bill it must, in his opinion, be a good bill.

I want to say also, Mr. Speaker, that when I knew this bill was to come up today, I notified my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn], and said that most likely he would be interested to speak on this bill and suggested that he be here. The gentleman never indicated in any way that he was against the bill, but indicated that he was for it.

Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; I desire no quarrel with him. Had I known of his interest in this legislation, I would have yielded to him gladly. I believe that as time goes along he in his good judgment at some later time will acknowledge that the bill is a fair one. I believe it is a good bill and that the gentleman will acknowledge it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did not hear me vote against the bill, did he?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I would not want to say whether the gentleman voted for or against the bill.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman make the statement that I said it was a good bill?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I made the general statement that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn] said that he had intended to introduce the bill that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Kelly, introduced in the last session; and that is very much the same bill.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman admits I told him that. Is it not a fact that the day after the gentleman introduced that bill Mr. Taylor, the head of the blind organization in the District of Columbia, called the gentleman on the phone and asked why he had done it, that he, Mr. Taylor, had given me the bill to present?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The day after I presented the bill Mr. Taylor called me and said that he had previously spoken to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn] and that he was very glad that someone had introduced the bill. I had never seen or spoken to Mr. Taylor before that. Had I known of the interest of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dunn], I would gladly have yielded to him, even though I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact that I am affiliated with the Pennsylvania Association for the Blind, of Pittsburgh, a member of the board of directors, and that, together with my other colleagues, I put the section in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania to give the blind of that State a pension.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I think the gentleman deserves the heartfelt and grateful thanks of the people of Pennsylvania for what he has done for the blind of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Every member of the legislature, Republican, Democrat, Socialist, was behind that measure and helped in putting it through. The gentleman knew I had this bill under consideration.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. No; I did not know it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The only reason I had not introduced it was my desire to learn if the President would sign it; and I contacted the White House for that purpose.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I never knew that the gentleman was considering this bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 4018, entitled "An act to provide for the investigation, control, and eradication of marine organisms injurious to shellfish in the Atlantic and Gulf States."

The bill authorizes appropriation of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of Commerce to conduct investigations and experiments for the determination of the best methods to control the leech, starfish, borer, and other pests injurious to oysters, clams, and scallops in waters of the Atlantic and Gulf States, immediately to apply control measures, and to make payments for the removal of these pests in such amounts and under such regulations as he may prescribe.

I am not satisfied that this very large appropriation would accomplish the result hoped for. I cannot get assurance of the probability of permanent eradication or control of these marine pests. Science has not yet discovered the answer. There is, on the other hand, every reason for further investigation and experimentation with the hope that a practical answer may be found. Such work can be carried on by the Bureau of Fisheries under existing authority.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 25, 1935.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Liberty has been defined as the right of each individual to do any and all acts excepting only such as might interfere with the rights of others. The right of every individual to do with his own exactly as he pleases so long as he does not interfere with the similar right of his neighbor.

His own activities and the property created thereby are his own, subject only to the taxing power of the state for the purpose of providing governmental determination and protection of those rights.

That superior right is determined by a majority of the individuals of a commonwealth and is changed from time to time as public interest may seem to require. Such changes should be made by a majority if representative government is to be maintained. The power of a minority to control is un-American, vicious, and threatens the Constitution, which is the very foundation of our Government.

Whenever a citizen is required to file a public tax record, such as form 1094—better known as the "pink slip"—which is open to the public, his liberty is gone. Those who do so willingly are without question entitled to do so, but the liberty of those who are forced to do so is destroyed. Many a person who lives in security may, upon publication of his tax return, be revealed as attractive prey for racketeers.

As an illustration of publicity let me quote from a Washington paper of February 18, 1935:

Eleanor Hanley was hailed as an exceedingly lucky person when she won $110,000 on the Irish sweepstakes 2 years ago. This New Jersey woman has been hounded since by gangsters and is now in an asylum. Doctors hold she is unable to handle her affairs.

Mr. Speaker, this unhappy story supplies a moral with which to adorn the pink-slip provision of the Revenue Act of 1934. I see the possibility of racketeers and gangsters capitalizing on the provision which would lay bare for all to see the affairs of taxpayers heretofore held secret by the Government. If the form provided publicity of the names of the taxpayers merely, I should not object. Neither would I object if those, particularly those in the upper brackets, were to file a return giving the information required now on form no. 1094 with the two committees of the House dealing with tax matters. I do not believe we should dedicate ourselves to furnishing a record to unscrupulous stock promoters, kidnapers, and racketeers, nor should we dedicate them to bringing embarrassment needlessly and uselessly, invading the privacy and the peace and happiness of people who feel that they have the right to keep their own affairs to themselves, consenting that the Government shall discharge its functions as respects the investigation of returns through agents employed by it.

All things being equal, unjust laws make more lawbreakers of law-abiding citizens than just laws make law-abiding citizens out of lawbreakers.

The spreading out of the returns and advertising them for inspection is more than annoying to people who are innocent of any offense against the Government. It is likely to bring trouble to the taxpayers who to a very large extent pay the money demanded by the Government.

But there stands the publicity provision. And what is to be done about it? Let us move at once for repeal of this obnoxious and dangerous provision of the law. The President and Secretary Morgenthau did not endorse it when it was proposed; nor have they indicated since that they regard it as possessing any merit. It is supported by no responsible agency. It can find favor only with the racketeers.

The good that has come out of recent income-tax disclosures has come from committees of Congress and not from publicity. Congress may have all returns for public purpose.

I hope Members of Congress will carefully consider these statements. I think it is necessary they do so, otherwise public sentiment will soon grow up in our Republic whose power and influence will be too large to cope with, a sentiment not in keeping with American traditions and ideals. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEITER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is the gentleman in position to tell the House if the Secretary of the Treasury is opposed to the section providing for publicity of all income-tax returns and is in favor of repeal?

Mr. BEITER. He is not opposed to it.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman then is in a position to say to the House that the Secretary desires the section repealed.

Mr. BEITER. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say that the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee told me Friday that he had submitted these bills to the Secretary of the Treasury and as soon as he received a report from the Secretary of the Treasury—if it was favorable to repeal—if it was possible for his committee to do so, he would take up the resolutions pending before his committee at an early date.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BEITER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I think the country is very anxious to know if there is any prospect for the repeal of this provision before the 15th of March. Can the gentleman give us any assurance in reference to that matter?

Mr. BEITER. Is the gentleman from Missouri a member of the committee, and can he answer that question?

Mr. COCHRAN. No; I am not a member of the committee, but I want to say I voted for this provision and the gentleman voted for this provision. Why? Because it was in the conference report and it was a case of take it or leave it. We had to have a revenue bill.

Mr. BEITER. This provision was added to the revenue bill when debated in the Senate. The other body is responsible for the publicity requirement.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did not the gentleman vote for the 1934 conference report on the revenue bill? I thought we all, or at least the Democrats, voted for that bill, and the section now complained of, a Senate amendment, was in that report. We had to take it whether we liked it or not at that time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 1 additional minute, so that he may answer certain questions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. I have not answered the gentleman from Missouri as vet.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman answer this question: What percentage of the population of our country files income-tax returns?

Mr. BEITER. Between 3 and 3½ percent. Mr. TRUAX. I understand that only about 3½ percent file returns, therefore 961/2 percent of our people are not affected at all by this so-called "pink slip" provision.

Mr. BEITER. Those who are not affected do not object. Mr. TRUAX. Certainly not. The millionaires and billionaires object.

Mr. BEITER. It is not only the millionaires, but all income-tax payers protest and rightfully demand repeal of the publicity provision as a matter of safety and well-being.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman spoke about racketeers. Does he mean the kidnaping racketeers, or the millionaire racketeers who rob and plunder the people and defraud the Treasury of the United States out of hundreds of millions of dollars in income taxes?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as

To Mr. STARNES, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. HARTLEY (at the request of Mr. CAVICCHIA), for the remainder of the week, on account of serious illness of father.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE BUSINESS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States, in a recent message to the Congress, declared in no uncertain terms that projects undertaken by the Government to provide employment and relief should be planned so as to compete as little as possible with private enterprise. I was happy to learn that the President assumes this attitude for it has long been my personal conviction that in such competition there exists grave dangers.

Continued exercise by Government of functions normally assumed by private initiative will, I fear, ultimately result in not only the development of a feeling of uncertainty among business men, but may cause a permanent lowering of wages and loss of mass purchasing power.

While it may be admitted that the Government can produce shoes or furniture or fertilizer and many other things at lower cost than private enterprise, those employed by the Government at necessarily low wages might better be engaged by private business and receive a higher income. As my colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Lloyp]. recently pointed out on the floor of the House, "every time you cut a piece of leather to make a pair of shoes through a Government agency you are putting a $5-per-day man on the relief rolls to fill his place with a $50-per-month man in your competing relief set-up."

I am familiar with the difficulties surrounding any attempt to enact legislation which might be expected to keep the Government out of business. The attempt in the last Congress to provide for a uniform system of cost accounting was, I believe, a step in the right direction. I venture to say that if the cost-accounting methods used by both private and public production units were identical it could be shown in many instances that the taxpayer's dollar might better be spent in purchase through competitive bids in the open

According to the Comptroller General and other interested officials, the measure proposed last year would have cost several millions of dollars and would have been difficult to administer. Not being altogether familiar with the bill I cannot personally attest to the truth of this contention, although the stand taken would appear reasonably tenable. Such a system would no doubt require constant revision and might be found a poor "yardstick" in the end.

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record as supporting any general movement on the part of the Members of this House which will mean the immediate cessation of Government competition with private business. As frequently contended by various Members, the most effective means of arriving at this objective lies in the framing of appropriation measures. I would like to see every conscientious Member who is opposed to this evil give close attention to all appropriations which enable the Government to go into or stay in any kind of business except in fields of research and experimentation, and I am in favor of placing strict limitation upon the latter.

The findings of the special House committee appointed by the Seventy-second Congress to investigate Government competition with private enterprise are well known. Data collected by this committee indicated that Government and private enterprise were competing in fields representing 225 items of trade, industry, and personal and professional service.

I take this opportunity to again list the fields in which it was contended before the committee that competition existed. They were as follows: Agriculture, amusements, architecture, baking, banking, livestock, ship chandlery, printing and binding, brickmaking, canning, brush and broom manufacture, canvas products, cement dealers, chemicals, clothing, coal business, coffee importation, contracting, the cotton industry, creameries, animal and fowl feeds, fruit and vegetable shippers, furs, the grain trade, ice manufacture, laundries, mechanical shop and marine work, shoe factories, the wool industry, dairy farming, engraving, envelops, stationery, explosives, the express industry, fertilizer products, furniture dealers and manufacturers, gasoline and oils, hotels and restaurants, insurance, lumber, saddlery and harness manufacture.

Why does this competition continue to exist and grow? Labor is opposed to it. No trade or industry of which I am aware favors it. It has been demonstrated that it is often costly to taxpayers. Who, then, desires its continuance?

What sound reasons can be advanced for its continuance? Why did the President take pains in his message of January 4 to make the following recommendation-I quote the President's message?-

The projects undertaken should be selected and planned so as to compete as little as possible with private enterprises. This suggests that if it were not for the necessity of giving useful work to the unemployed now on relief, these projects in most instances would not now be undertaken.

It appears to me that there is no more reason in the continuance of the manufacture of clothing, for instance, by the Government than there would be in denying the wisdom of the words of our President.

Even though the Members of this body may feel impelled to cast their votes in the light of political expediency rather than follow their honest convictions. I ask you to glance in the RECORD at the list of lines of endeavor which I have named and ponder the consequences of its extension. It is fortunate, perhaps, that I may respond to both political expediency and my honest convictions and yet feel quite comfortable when I return to my home district.

ADDRESS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address recently delivered by the Secretary of the Interior to a very large gathering of public officials and stockmen of the West in the city of Denver, concerning the systematic use and preservation of the public domain of the 14 Western States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, delivered by the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Harold L. Ickes, before a very large gathering of public officials and stockmen from practically all the Western States, at a meeting in the city of Denver, February 12, 1935.

The address contains such an exhaustive presentation of the present conditions of the public domain throughout the public-lands States of the West, so much important information, his conception of the spirit and intent of that law, and his hopes and intentions regarding its rightful administration, that I am confident the address will be not only interesting and instructive to the public in general and the West in particular, but will be an historic State paper pertaining to the orderly use, conservation, and development of the public domain of the West.

Governor Johnson, officials of the Western States, members of the Colorado Legislature, and ladies and gentlemen, your presence here today is a frank recognition of a fact that we have known for a long time, but which we have been unwilling to admit—the fact that the physical frontier of the United States is gone forever. This fact calls for a drastic change in our national land policy. The free and unrestricted use of the public range must give way to a policy of prudent use of that same range for the welfare of the whole country. This new policy, as expressed in the Taylor Grazing Act, is primarily in the interest of those whose livelihood depends upon the maintenance of the public range—the cattlemen and sheepmen of America. The Government, with the intelligent and whole-hearted support of the stockmen of this western country, hopes so to be able to administer the Taylor Grazing Law that there will be more and better grazing lands in the future than there are at present. It was to protect and build up the range for you that this law was passed. It is to take counsel with you as to the best means to protect and build up the range that I have come all the way from Washington. Governor Johnson, officials of the Western States, members of the passed. It is to take counsel with your as to the best literals to protect and build up the range that I have come all the way from Washington.

In the early days of our country, the public domain of the National Government consisted of 260,000,000 acres of land. These acres were contributed by seven of the original Thirteen Colonies. Then, as the result of conquest, exploration, treaties with foreign nations, and purchase, we found ourselves in possession of an empire of a billion and a half acres, equivalent to about 80 percent of the area of the entire country. Originally this great domain was relied upon as a source of revenue out of which the expenses of the Government could be paid. Parcels of it were sold for cash. This system was abandoned in 1841 when the preemption law was enacted, permitting individual acquisitions of 160 acres by settlement and the payment of $1.25 per acre. In 1862 the free-homestead law was passed by the Congress. Under this act any American citizen had the right to establish a home of his own on a tract of 160 acres, regarded at that time as a farm unit adequate to maintain a family in comfort.

The result of the early land policy of the Nation can be readily visualized if you will fly westward from the Allegheny Mountains. The landscape you will see presents the aspect of a vast checkerboard of small, prosperous farms. Areas of grain stubble, evidencing abundant crops, fallow land, pastures, wood lots, all bound together in 40-, 80-, or 160-acre tracts that are punctuated with barnyards and comfortable dwellings, form an almost continuous patchwork, broken here and there by channels of streams or interrupted by towns. This is the nature of the scenery until the western section of the Mississippi Valley is reached. Here lies a transition zone into the dry, semi-arid plains that extend westward to the base of the Rocky Mountains. In this section of the country different climatic and soil conditions required another plan of land development, to meet which the so-called "dry-farming of 320 acres. Further west still, about midway of the semi-arid plains region, large areas of native, short-grass grazing lands begin to dominate the landscape. For land of this type the Congress in 1916 enacted the 640 acres homestead law.

Concurrent with the progressive development of land uses for the homesteader there has been legislation for other special land uses. An ordinance enacted in 1785 initiated a policy of reserving minerals and the practice of leasing mineral lands was inaugurated in 1807. Timber reservations came into use in 1799, although the idea of national forest reserves was not conceived until March 3, 1891. Yellowstone National Park was created by an act of Congress on March 1, 1872, and national monuments were authorized on June 8, 1906. The theory of creating reservations for Indians has been in effect almost from the beginning of our dealing with these original Americans. In sum, there are now special laws for almost every land-use activity in connection with the public domain.

The early land policies that sooner or later found expression in The early land policies that sooner or later found expression in Federal legislation were policies of expediency. They did not carry out any carefully developed plan. Indeed, there seemed no necessity for a plan reaching into the future and based upon a determination of the best uses to which various lands in different sections of the country might be put. Land was illimitable. It stretched ever to the far-western horizon, and the farther one traveled toward the west, the farther away seemed that horizon. With land ever ahead, to be had for the asking or, at worst, for a nominal sum, no need could be seen for a carefully thought-out and well-developed land policy. There was no occasion even to maintain the fertility land policy. There was no occasion even to maintain the fertility of the farm presently occupied. When that fertility was drained into the corn or the wheat or shipped to market as beef or pork, the seminomadic American farmer could once more fold up his tents and resume the western trail.

But there came a time, which we now realize should have been But there came a time, which we now realize should have been foreseen, when we discovered that our land resources were not inexhaustible. There were no more fertile farms to be had for the taking. The unfortunate farmer who improvidently had used up his land without ever feeling an obligation to maintain or restore its fertility found himself struggling for a bare existence on soil that, formerly capable of producing abundant crops, had imperceptibly become submarginal. In those sections of the West where great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep had had limitless range upon which to sustain themselves it gradually came to be where great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep had had limitless range upon which to sustain themselves it gradually came to be realized that there was no longer sufficient forage to meet the demands that were made upon it. So we were brought face to face with a problem of tremendous import to the future of America. It was no longer a question of what we were going to do with new and unappropriated land upon which we could indefinitely expand for all time to come. It became a question of what we must do with the lands that we already had, the limits of which had been ascertained, in order to prevent further deterioration and disintegration, so as to protect and preserve them for the generations that were to follow us. that were to follow us.

We came to recognize not only the advantages but the absolute necessity of intelligent land-use planning. We came to realize that such planning is not only a national problem, that it is a State and local problem as well. Just as a wise farmer studies his lands in order that he may know the values with which he deals, the best uses to which his lands may be put, so must the Government, as we now see it, take a careful inventory of the lands of the Nation with a view to determining the best uses to which every section of that land may be put. Our rich endowment of good earth has made it possible for us to build up the greatest nation in the history of the world. An intelligent and prudent use of our land, since there are no new lands for us to occupy, is absolutely necessary if we are to go forward as a people into a richer, fuller, and more worth-while life.

A proper approach to the problem confronting us requires a fuller, and more worth-while life.

A proper approach to the problem confronting us requires a correlation of our national needs for land with our population. The growth of population in the United States during the past century and a half probably is unprecedented in the history of the world. The census of 1790 counted 3,929,000 persons and that of 1930, 122,775,000. The increase from 1920 to 1930 alone amounted to 17,000,000 people, or almost the total of the present population of Canada and Australia combined. This rapid increase stimulated industry, commerce, and transportation and caused an enormous expansion in agriculture that was reflected in an advance in land values. It involved a vast and more or less wasteful exploitation of our natural resources. our natural resources.

The expectation of a continued rapid increase in population has constituted an important element in our national calculahas constituted an important element in our national calculations and policies. At the present time a declining birth rate, plus limitations on foreign immigration, indicate that soon after 1960 the population will have reached its maximum, after which it will begin to decline. But although our population may become stationary, or in fact decline, we must not weaken in our determination to develop our lands to their fullest and best uses. We want our children, whether they are greater or lesser in number, to have a greater average share in the fullness of the earth than we today have.

of the earth than we today have.

On the basis of this forecast as to population trends, our scientists assure us that, properly husbanded, our land resources are adequate for our future population. They say that in 1960 the major uses of the 1,900,000,000 acres in the United States will be about as follows: Harvested crops, 20 percent; pasture and range (part forest and woodland), 52 percent; forest and woodland not grazed, 14 percent; cities, towns, roads, farmsteads, idle or fallow land, waste, etc., 14 percent.

These are substantially the percentages of the major land uses today. The principal predicated change is that a reduction of 4 percent in pasture and range land, of which 1 percent will be

4 percent in pasture and range land, of which 1 percent will be converted to harvested crop land and the other 3 percent will be devoted to urban uses. It appears that we can provide an ample food and timber supply for our people. It appears further that on the nonagricultural land we can make a relatively abundant provision for wildlife and recreation as compared with other countries. But in order to do this we must take thought not only for the morrow but for today. We must prevent further deterioration and destruction of our good earth.

I wonder if the people realize the extent to which erosion is areas our country is being stripped of its rich covering of soil or gullied beyond repair. The annual cost of erosion to our farmers has been estimated at $400,000,000. This does not take into account the choking of stream channels and the filling up with silt of reservoirs and irrigation ditches, a matter of vital concern to this western country.

this western country

At least 35,000,000 acres of formerly cultivated land, much of it originally good land, have been practically destroyed in this country by erosion. Another 100,000,000 acres of crop lands are in serious danger. The evidence is that it requires at least 400 years to build a single inch of productive soil from raw subsoil clay. In total, it may take nature two or three thousand years to heal the wounds that erosion inflicts. The experts say that 3,000,000,000 tons of soil material are washed out of our fields and pastures every year. More than 400,000,000 tons of suspended soild matter and many more millions of tons of dissolved matter pass out the and many more millions of tons of dissolved matter pass out the mouth of the Mississippi River every year.

Another serious erosion problem is the blowing off of the topsoil

Another serious erosion problem is the blowing oil of the topsoil by wind. In the summer of 1933 extensive areas were stripped of topsoil by the almost continuous winds accompanying the severe drought in the Wheat Belt of Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas. These winds stripped thousands of acres of their rich covering of surface soil, in many instances to depths of more than 8 inches. Soil material from the Red Plains of Texas and Oklahoma was carried for a distance of nearly 800 miles into southwestern Iowa.

Early last summer in Washington for 2 or 3 days we were sub-merged in what appeared to be a gritty mist. At a Cabinet meet-ing one day during that period the Secretary of Agriculture told ing one day during that period the Secretary of Agriculture told us that what we were experiencing was a tremendous dust storm that originated a thousand miles away. How many thousands of tons of rich topsoil were carried away by that destructive windstorm, to be deposited as dust in the skyscrapers of Chicago and in the Government buildings of Washington or blown out to sea, I cannot even guess, but I do know that in a forceful and dramatic way there was told to those dwelling in the East the tragic story of wind erosion.

"The sins of the fathers will be visited upon the children even unto the third and fourth generations." The sins of our fathers are being visited upon us and we in our turn are committing sins that our children will be called upon to expiate. Our thoughtless, exploiting forefathers, with no thought of the future and without knowledge of or concern for the natural and inevitable consequences of their acts, loosed forces which, unless we check them, will in time go far toward making of our land a barren land with resulting impoverishment of our people.

An example of destructive exploitation of a natural resource is to be found on the public range, that vast area here in the West

An example of destructive exploitation of a natural resource is to be found on the public range, that vast area here in the West and in the Southwest, where great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep are grazed. Our literature is rich with tales of the cowboy rounding up his herds and protecting them from two-footed and four-footed thieves. The lonely shepherd passing long vigils on the high slopes with only his flocks for companionship has been the hero of many a song and story. We have seen the West largely through the eyes of romance. It has meant to us sheepmen and cattlemen at war; dead-shot cowboys pursuing cattle rustlers; horse thieves dangling from lonely trees; outlaws holding up stage coaches; sullen and discontented Indians being pressed ever backward into the least productive land.

Little have we realized that also on these great plains the ever backward into the least productive land.

Little have we realized that also on these great plains the greatest resource that we possess—land—is being thoughtlessly destroyed at an alarming rate. The cattle and sheep industries cannot survive without wide grazing areas. Common sense would seem to dictate that the pasturage bestowed upon us by nature should be cherished. The contrary has been the fact. The western range is being seriously depleted through overgrazing. The cattlemen and the sheepmen, with little regard either for the future or for their own immediate welfare, gradually but thoroughly have been destroying their own means of livelihood. It has been that no single blade of grass may stick its venturesome head through the soil and hope long to evade the hungry foraging head through the soil and hope long to evade the hungry foraging of steer or sheep. In the spring when the grass is fresh and tender and thus most easily injured or destroyed, livestock are turned loose to devour it, roots and all. This overgrazed land has been having its topsoil washed away. It is being cut into gullies. Without its grass protection it is an easy victim to any sudden downpour or prolonged rain.

I have stood on the edge of a dry arroyo in New Mexico that suddenly became a raging torrent. There had been a heavy rain many miles away in the mountains. The sun is shining on the plain. Then, with only a distant roar to give warning, a wall of water comes tumbling down, carrying with it thousands of tons of earth in solution. An automobile caught in the bottom of the arroyo at such a time will be swept downstream in an instant, to be covered by silt before the onlookers can realize what is happening.

covered by silt before the onlookers can realize what is happening. In one arroyo only a few years ago, where the Santa Fe Trail crosses it near Gallup, a Greyhound bus was caught in such a torrent of water. The passengers barely escaped with their lives, and within half an hour that bus had completely disappeared into the earth. It has been urged that soil erosion is a natural process. That is so. The growth of grass, bushes, and trees is also a natural process. The latter process, if nature is not unduly interfered with, will check the former. It is the aim of nature to maintain a balance. That man will not be heard to complain that it is nature that is destroying his land through erosion if, on his part, by destroying the protective covering that nature gave his land, he has himself let loose this destructive force of nature. It is so easy and comforting to blame the Deity for what we ourselves are responsible.

ing to blame the Deity for what we ourselves are responsible. Our able Secretary of Agriculture said to me recently that we ought to educate the people of this country to be "grass conscious." And he is right. Maintain grass on the range and new cracks and gullies will cease to form. Plant grass on the slopes and at the headwaters of the streams and floods will be controlled. The strongest and most persistent of winds cannot get at the topsoil to blow it away if it is protected by grass. If the farmer will plant more grass, he will not only protect his erodible soil, he will raise less wheat and corn to press upon an overburdened market. A wise use of grass will solve many a problem of conservation, of agriculture, and of economics. agriculture, and of economics.

Preventable erosion of valuable soil is only one chapter in the story of the wasteful exploitation of our natural resources. I shall not today attempt even in outline to tell the whole of this story. On other occasions I have discussed different phases of it, such as the destruction of our forests with resulting floods, of which we the destruction of our forests with resulting floods, of which we recently have had another bitter experience on the lower Mississippi River. I have told the tale of the waste of our petroleum resources; I have referred to the destruction of our birds, our fish, and other forms of our wild life, but today I want to confine myself more particularly to the problems in which you are interested as users of the public range.

One of those problems, and an important one, relates to our water supply. I wonder how many of you have heard about Devils Lake in North Dakota and the tragedy that is occurring there? Forty or fifty years ago fish were caught in one of the arms of the lake on the border of the town that stood on its shore. That town is now nearly 3 miles from the shore of the lake. From 1867 to 1932 the lake level fell 29 feet and the area of the lake diminished correspondingly. It fell 10 feet between 1883 and 1890. Since that date it has declined steadily 16 additional feet. According to the Geological Survey the decline 16 additional feet. According to the Geological Survey the decline of this lake may be attributed to reduced precipitation and the modification of surface conditions resulting from man's activities. Now the people who are dependent upon the water of Devils Lake are demanding that its old level be restored by diverting into it flood waters from the upper Missouri at an enormous cost.

In many parts of the country people are seriously disturbed by the decline in the underground water levels. We get reports that wells that formerly furnished an adequate supply of water have to be sunk even deeper and deeper. Irrigation projects that at their inception had plenty of water are now turning to other watersheds for an increased supply to make up for losses. Tunnels are being bored in some sections of the Rocky Mountains to carry water to hungry lands that formerly were sufficiently supplied from their own watershed.

Only a few days ago I suthorized a survey by the Bureau of

Only a few days ago I authorized a survey by the Bureau of Reclamation to determine how much water could be spared from the watershed west of the Rockies and how best that water could the watershed west of the Rockies and now best that water could be carried through the mountains to the eastern slope. The Government is finding it necessary to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to dredge and channel the beds of such rivers as the Mississippi and the Missouri in order to make the greatest possible use of the shrunken supply of waters that these river beds now contain. We have authorized the building of an enormous dam at Fort Peck, Mont., to give tributary territory the water that it

As you probably know, there is a clear and distinct connection between water supply and the uses to which land can be put. Cut down your forests or destroy the natural coverage of the public range and you create a condition of alternating floods and droughts. Deprived of its natural coverage, the topsoil loses its absorptive qualities so that the rains, instead of being caught and held and so permitted to seep naturally into the ground there to fill our wells or flow through underground channels into our rivers and lakes, run off immediately, the down-rushing water carrying with it the rich topsoil, thus eroding the land and diminishing relentlessly year after year the areas upon which you must depend for forage for your cattle. You cannot eat your cake and have it too. If you continue to destroy the range by overgrazing, you are not only depriving your cattle and your sheep of food, you are causing year after year an ever-diminishing supply of water, which is the very lifeblood of this section of the country.

The deterioration of the public domain through competitive and unregulated grazing has set in motion several processes of destruction. To enumerate them: The range is being seriously depleted; the water table is sinking ever lower; lands are being washed away by accelerated floods and blown away during dry seasons; extensive irrigation developments are jeopardized by the As you probably know, there is a clear and distinct connection seasons; extensive irrigation developments are jeopardized by the silting of ditches and storage reservoirs. The result is that the livestock industry is suffering from the loss of forage resources. We are learning that if the sensitive balance normally maintained by nature is disturbed by man, it is man who will be called upon by nature is disturbed by man, it is man who will be called upon to pay the cost.

The economic rehabilitation of the country is dependent in large measure upon adequate range regulation, flood control and erosion prevention. For years we have been trying to control floods. For the first time in our history this administration has initiated a serious attempt to do something about erosion. And now range regulation is having our interested attention.

Erosion is insidious. The first stage is sheet erosion, often so imperceptible that the effects can be detected only by changes in the color of the soil or by an otherwise scarcely noticeable lowering of productivity. Next comes "shoestring" erosion, and finally gully erosion. Water, acting through floods, is the better known cause of erosion, but, in the arid regions, and, during droughts in the normally humid regions, wind is a powerful eroding agent. The work to rebuild the range and control erosion that will follow the inauguration of proper range-management practices will be facilitated by the activities of seven E. C. W. camps which will be established on the public lands April 1.

Later the number of these camps will be materially increased, and work will not be limited to erosion prevention but will also include the development of water for stock and the construction of trails, fences, and other needed improvements. Rodent extermination will be another important activity. Poison plants will be eradicated in some areas.

The preservation and restoration of wildlife, involving as they do the establishment of extensive wilderness areas, will afford an opportunity for physical enjoyment and mental stimulation that will add much to our well-being. This is peculiarly a field for Federal action. It has been a badly neglected sector of the recreational field. So far as game is concerned, we are, I believe, rapidy moving away from our insistence on a present opportunity to hunt, with slight regard for the future, to an equal insistence on real conservation of our game resources. This calls for a more liberal devotion of land to this resource, but it is justifiable, not only on the basis of social importance but of actual economic value, as a variety of experience has shown. Large areas of mountain and valley, of forest and plain, of stream and lake, should and must be valley, of forest and plain, of stream and lake, should and must be devoted primarily to this type of use. Certain species of birds and animals close to extinction should be declared wards of the Federal Government and protected wherever they may be found. If it is wise, the West will consider game as one of its rich resources, to be carefully protected under plans that are integrated with other plans for a balanced social and economic order.

An Executive order of November 26, 1934, withdrew practically all of the public lands of the United States from all forms of entry pending classification in aid of administration of the Taylor Graz-pending classification in aid of administration of the Taylor Grazing Law of June 28, 1934, a law that will stand for all time as a monument to the statesmanship and purposefulness of an out-standing Member of the House of Representatives, Congressman Taylor of Colorado. On that date the era of catch-as-catch-can use of the Federal public domain came to an end. In the future the public domain will be prudently managed on the basis of precise information on the best use of the land. Water-power lands, timber lands, mineral lands, national parks, monuments, wildlife refuges, and grazing lands will be administered by agencles charged with the responsibility for their proper management. The Government will also undertake a special task involving the carrying out of outstanding land-grant obligations and the coordinating of all activities for the conservation of natural resources into a land program that will provide for the most effective utilization.

The remaining area of vacant, unreserved public domain is 165,-

The remaining area of vacant, unreserved public domain is 165,-695,000 acres. Ninety-eight percent of this land lies within a section of the West which receives a rainfall ranging from 2 to 15 inches per annum. This dry section has an aggregate of 545,000,000 acres, or 30 percent of America. In addition to the open public domain there are 90,000,000 acres in the national forests and an estimated additional area of about 25,000,000 acres is Federal land of various other types. Therefore the Federal Government now owns more than half the total of the region referred to.

The States own large acreages of school lands, and have other grants in this same area, besides which there is an undetermined acreage of chronically tax-delinquent lands which might be called the new public domain. The aggregate area of public domain, plus State and county-owned land is not known, but probably it is between 60 and 75 percent of the region. The harvested crop land in this section is 17,000,000 acres, about 3.1 percent of the total, and this is mainly irrigated land. The rural population of this region comprises 1,942,000, or 2½ percent, of the population of the country. This population is distributed in a ratio of one person to 280 acres or probably one family to not less than 1,000 acres.

For the open range region the Taylor Grazing Law, in my opinion, provides a rational system of management. I believe its benefits are so obvious that, once understood in the West, a similar plan will be adopted for State, county, school, and railroad grants. It is my hope that a plan of cooperative procedure will be devised under which all of these classifications of land can be administered in a manner similar to that under the Taylor Act for the stabilization of the livestock industry in this region.

This law authorizes administration of the public domain along the following lines:

The creating of grazing districts of a total aggregate of 80,000,000 acres of vacant, unreserved public land.

(2) The issuance of leases to individual stockmen on isolated disconnected tracts of 640 acres or more that are not susceptible to practical administration as parts of grazing districts.

(3) The sale at public auction of isolated or disconnected parcels of land not exceeding 760 acres each in area

cels of land not exceeding 760 acres each in area.

(4) The exchange of privately owned lands within a district for other public land of equal value, and, in a similar manner, the exchange of any State-owned lands on application of a State.

(5) The classification for homestead entry of lands in grazing districts that are more valuable and suitable for the production of agricultural crops than for grazing.

Approximately 50 grazing districts will be organized. It is estimated that not less than 75,000 applications will be filed for grazing privileges in such districts, distributed by States as follows: Arizona, 3,000; California, 4,000; Colorado, 3,000; Idaho, 10,000; Montana, 15,000; Nevada, 5,000; New Mexico, 5,000; Oregon, 10,000;

Utah, 10,000; Wyoming, 10,000. So far as practicable, the districts will be organized in convenient administrative units of an average of probably 1,500 to 2,000 individual users who subject to a policy to be declared by the Department of the Interior, will elect advisory committees in a ratio of 1 committeeman to each 100 to 150 stockmen.

It is suggested that the advisory committees shall have original jurisdiction in promulgating rules and regulations for fair range practices in each district, subject to final approval by the Department of the Interior. It is anticipated that these committees will serve as boards of arbitration to pass upon all matters involving the internal affairs of the districts. They will be furnished with the reports on land classifications showing proper range carrying capacities and with the records of applications for grazing permits. With this information, aided by the counsel and advice of the Grazing Division, they will propose an equitable apportionment of the available range privileges within each district. They will take cognizance of such matters as breeding standards and other subjects of common interest pertaining to animal husbandry.

The election of the committees will occur at a time and place to be fixed in each proclamation creating a grazing district. The be fixed in each proclamation creating a grazing district. The Grazing Service will retain responsibility for the enforcement of the rules and regulations and the final determination of range carrying capacities, as well as for directing improvements and range rehabilitation work.

A tentative plan of procedure provides for:

(1) The issuance of proclamations creating the grazing districts on or before April 15.

(2) The filing of applications for permits on or before May 1.

(3) Meetings for the election of the advisory committees on or before July 1

(4) The analysis of permit applications by the committees, and the preliminary classifications and allocation of range privileges on or before October 1.

on or before October 1.

Grazing privileges will be apportioned on the principle of aiding in the "proper use" of land or water owned or controlled by each applicant. For example, a man may file an application for range sufficient to graze 100 head of cattle or 500 head of sheep, or some multiple of these numbers, for a given period of months. If he owns or controls property sufficient to support that number of stock for the remaining months of the year, he will be given preferential consideration. Where the range is inadequate to take care of all such preferences, it must be apportioned on a pro rata basis, with special consideration given to small operators. Where water rights control the use of the range the owner of such rights must be given a preference rating depending upon local conditions and the customary range practices of the locality.

There must necessarily remain a large acreage of land in small scattered tracts incapable of administration in grazing districts under the Taylor Law. Such lands will be needed to satisfy out-scattered tracts incapable of administration in grazing districts under the Taylor Law. Such lands will be needed to satisfy outstanding grants that may have failed for any reason. Many of these tracts will be located within established ranch units, the owners of which may wish to purchase them for the protection of their investments in adjoining lands. The policy of permitting such purchases should be given careful consideration. In some States there will be a desire to exchange for Government land, contented school sections within a graping district for the number. scattered school sections within a grazing district for the purpose of consolidating ownership. The Taylor Law authorizes such exchanges on applications from the States.

changes on applications from the States.

I come now to a discussion of fees to be paid for the use of the range. The Interior Department will have no quarrel with stockmen on that subject. You are willing to pay reasonable fees, and that is all we will expect. I believe that fees should be on a sliding scale varying with the earning capacity of the land as measured by the market value of the livestock grazed upon it. Fees should not be so low as to arouse the envy of those not entitled to public-range rights, or as to subject the permittees to a charge of receiving a Government subsidy.

The whole question of fees, at the beginning, will be experimental. We will approach the matter with an open mind and consider it from the standpoint alike of the public interest and of the welfare of the stockmen.

This conference has been arranged on the theory that stock-of the welfare of the stockmen.

This conference has been arranged on the theory that stockmen, grazing States, and Nation are all vitally interested in the question: How can the Taylor Grazing Law be administered so that the range may provide forage for the largest possible numbers of livestock while at the same time giving the Federal Government the opportunity that it desires, not only to prevent further deterioration of the range, but actually to build it up? I have referred in general terms to many of the problems implicit in this question, but I shall leave detailed discussion to those better qualified than I to express opinions founded upon experience and expert knowledge. expert knowledge.

I shall await the results of this conference and the findings that you may agree upon, with the keenest possible interest. This is a working conference, called together to consider matters of grave importance. I hope that in a truly cooperative spirit you will engage in a full and frank discussion, and I have no doubt that your conclusions, which will later be submitted to me, will be your conclusions, which will later be submitted to me, will be based not only upon sound reason but upon the proposition that what is for the greatest good of the greatest number of stockmen is also for the greatest good of the Nation.

After all, the Taylor Grazing Law was conceived in the interest of the stockmen. The Nation cannot afford unduly to restrict or hamper the enterprise of the men of the West upon whose energy and initiative the whole people must depend for their beef and their mutton and the byproducts that flow from your great industry. So interested is the Federal Government in fostering and building up the livestock industry that it has been decided, as a matter of paramount national policy, that no one in the future will be permitted to destroy the range or impair its capacity to graze the herds that will become increasingly dependent upon it. Fortunately, in this instance the interest of the Nation and of the industry go hand in hand. You stockmen know that you cannot continue in business without sufficient forage for your herds and flocks. Enlightened self-interest calls for whole-hearted support by you of the policies declared by the Taylor Grazing Law. And on our part we want to work with you in a spirit of helpful cooperation.

Not only self-interest, but a patriotic regard for the highest interest of the Nation will impel you, I am sure, to work hand in hand with your Government in making this epochal act the means of a major contribution to the prosperity and contentment of the whole people. I want to emphasize that the policy of the Federal Government, as expressed in this law, will be not only to protect and administer the range in the interest of your essential industry; it will be equally our policy to give to the small, independent stockman that protection which he so badly needs and which he has so sadly lacked in times past. The public range is to be devoted to the greatest good of the greatest number of those dependent upon it. Size will not count as against this dedication to the common good; political influence will be of no avail. In more ways than one, the Taylor Grazing Law is not merely a regulatory measure to upbuild and maintain the public range and to control its use in the interest of the stockmen of the Nation. It is a Magna Carta upon which the prosperity, well-being, and happiness of large sections of this great western country of ours will in the future depend.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, before the motion to adjourn is made, can the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] tell us what the order of business will be tomorrow?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Frankly I cannot say very definitely. We have several matters pending that may possibly come up, if the committees get ready to report. I understand there are one or two rules that may come up, and the farm credit bill may be ready.

Mr. MAPES. The farm credit bill that was reported by the Committee on Agriculture?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are two rules to come up tomorrow, one relating to the marketing of rice and the other relating to the jurisdiction of a number of committees.

Mr. CULKIN. May I ask the gentleman what will be the next appropriation bill to be taken up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The next general appropriation bill will be the Interior Department bill of which I, as chairman, have charge. We have completed the hearings and marked up the bill, and I think we may be ready by Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. MAPES. Will it be ready this week?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, we will be ready this week. But if the Jones bill and other matters take up the time until Friday, I would not start the consideration of the Interior Department bill on Friday. That bill will require 3 days, and I expect to ask the House to adjourn over Saturday. I understand the H. O. L. C. bill may come up on Thursday.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, that is a little indefinite. No arrangement has been made for the consideration of that bill in the House. It cannot come up for consideration in the House unless a rule is granted or the unanimous consent of the House is given. So far there has been no application for the consideration of a rule.

Looking forward, I may say there is a bare possibility it may come up for consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The rice-marketing bill will probably follow the Jones bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, then we are to understand that the rice bill will be up tomorrow?

The SPEAKER. I understand so.

ADJOURNMENT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 26, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Spirit of God, whose breath is our life, who lightest our lamp and feedest the flame thereof, that we may look upon ourselves and on our world as the effluence and expression of Thy gentle might: attune our ears, that in the march of things we may hear the sound of Thy going, that in the mystery of things we may hear the moving of Thy purpose; and with Thy fresh coming do Thou scatter each bewildering thought, even as darkness melts away at touch of dawn.

Help us to look beyond this vale of time and sense 'til we shall recognize the evils that beset us as hidings of Thy love, which, yielding to our valiant effort, shall one day stand revealed, bright as the clear morning, wonderful as cloudless We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. Robinson, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 25, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 31) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. Groff.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 402) to amend section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 83. An act to provide for the conservation and settlement of estates of absentees and absconders in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 3464. An act to amend certain sections of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, relating to descent and distribution;

H. R. 3477. An act relating to the incorporation of Trinity College of Washington, D. C., organized under and by virtue of a certificate of incorporation pursuant to the incorporation laws of the District of Columbia, as provided in sub-chapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia:

H. R. 4538. An act to change the designation of Lefler Place to Second Place; and

H. R. 5711. An act to provide pensions for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia and authorizing appropriations therefor.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Barbour] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR UNDER RULE VIII

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under rule VIII.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that will permit the calling up of any order of business on the calendar and making a motion to consider it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT JONESBORO, ARK.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the acquisition of land to provide appropriate means of access to the postoffice building at Jonesboro, Ark., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation to enable the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to carry on its work until the next regular session of Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. Costigan on yesterday, p. 2515, Congressional Record.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Concurrent Memorial 4

Praying that part of the appropriation of $4,800,000,000 requested by the President for public-works improvement be set aside exclusively for highway purposes

To the Honorable Representatives of the State of Arizona and the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

Whereas the President in his wisdom has seen fit to request the Congress of the United States to forthwith make available $4,800,-000,000 for the relief of the unemployed through public-works improvements; and

Whereas the expenditure of a part of such sum for the construction and maintenance of highways will result directly in the relief of the unemployed and at the same time add to the capital wealth of this country; and

Whereas the United States Bureau of Public Roads and the highway departments of the several States are adequately equipped and experienced to conveniently and economically expend or super-vise the expenditure of any available moneys for highway construction and improvement purposes;

Wherefore your memorialist prays:
That the representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States use their best efforts to secure the President and the Congress to set aside a definite portion of such sum of $4,800,000,000 for expenditure under like terms and conditions as set up in sections 204 and 205 of the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, and amendments thereto, for highway construction and improvement purposes.

And your memorialist will ever pray. Adopted by the house February 18, 1935. Adopted by the senate February 13, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and

Senate Joint Memorial 8

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:
Your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon in regular session assembled, respectfully request and petition as follows:
Whereas the United States Government has appropriated various sums of money for the voluntary eradication of Bang's disease among cattle, and such funds so appropriated will either be consumed or cease to be available after December 31, 1935: and

Whereas such program has been of great benefit to the dairy and beef cattle industry of this State, and it is to the best interests of the public and said industry that additional funds be made available for 1 year after December 31, 1935, for the purpose of continuing such eradication program: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of resentatives jointly concurring therein), That your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, do hereby respectfully request and petition that the Congress of the United States make an additional appropriation for the eradication of Bang's disease among cattle in the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that the Government of the United States should perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on the basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, and that adequate legislation to that end should be adequated the explicit prescribes each be adopted at the earliest possible date

Whereas the farmers throughout the entire United States have whereas the farmers throughout the entire Office States have lost and are losing their lands and chattels through inability to refinance loans on their property because of high interest rates and low prices of agricultural commodities; and

Whereas agriculture is the basic industry of this country, and there can be no sound business prosperity unless the business of agriculture is placed on a sound basis and on an equal basis with other industries; and other industries: and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Senate of the United States known as the "farmers' farm-relief act", commonly called the "Frazier bill"; and

A bill to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness, and

A bill to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness, and to encourage and promote agriculture, commerce, and industry by establishing an efficient credit system, through which the unjust and unequal burdens placed upon agriculture during the period of price fixing and deflation may be lightened by providing for the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest through the Federal farm-loan system, the Federal Reserve Banking System, and the Postal Savings Depository System, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same; and

Whereas this bill is a sound economic measure, designed to remedy the inequalities under which agriculture is now laboring:

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Min-

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Min

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urgently petitioned to enact the said bill into law, and that the President of the United States be urged to approve said measure after its passage; be it further Resolved, That the Minnesota Members of the United States Senate and the Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota be, and they are hereby, petitioned and most earnestly urged to use their best efforts to bring about a speedy enactment of said legislation; be it further

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be presented to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States. the United States

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to eliminate the long-and-short-haul clause from the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act, or to modify the same so that railroads may be permitted to establish rates which will enable Middle West industries to meet the competition of eastern manufacturers transporting their goods through the Panama Canal

Whereas the long-and-short-haul clause of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act prohibits railroads from making a lesser charge for a longer than for a shorter distance over the same line in the same direction unless authorized to do so by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas the higher rail rates from Minnesota and other States in the Middle West to the Pacific coast than water rates from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal has resulted in Middle West manufacturers' losing all or a substantial part of their markets on the Pacific coast to the advantage of their competitors located in the East; and

Whereas the elimination of the long-and-short-haul clause from the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act would allow the railroads to establish reduced rates from the Middle West to the Pacific coast to meet this water competition without depress-ing below a reasonable level their rail rates to points inland from the Pacific coast where such water competition does not exist; and

Whereas such a readjustment of rail rates will enable Middle West manufacturers to regain a substantial part of their Pacific west manufacturers to regain a substantial part of their Pacific coast business, will result in increased employment in Middle West industries, will give added employment to labor in transporting such added rail traffic to the Pacific coast, and will enable the railroads to earn some additional net revenue to the advantage of farmers and residents generally of the Middle West and West who must employ the railroads to transport their products to market and furnish them with long-head transportation; and must employ the railroads to transport their product and furnish them with long-haul transportation; and

Whereas reduced rail rates from the Middle West to the Pacific whereas reduced rail rates from the Middle West to the Pacific coast will not result in eliminating eastern manufacturers from the Pacific coast markets or the boat lines from carrying traffic through the canal, but will simply afford Middle West manufacturers an opportunity to compete with eastern manufacturers for a fair share of the Pacific coast business on a properly related basis of freight rates; and

Whereas the Middle West contributed by taxes to the construction of the Panama Canal and contributes to its maintenance and support and should be permitted to have a basis of rail rates which will prevent the Panama Canal from working an unjust discrimination against Middle West industries and employment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That Congress be memorialized to eliminate the long-and-short-haul clause from the fourth section of the Interstate Comshort-hadi clause from the fourth section of the interstate Commerce Act, or to modify the same so as to effectively permit railroads to establish rates to the Pacific coast from the Middle West which will enable Middle West industries to meet the competition of eastern manufacturers using water transportation through the Panama Canal; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to both houses of the Legislatures of North and South Dakota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois, to the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, the Senators and Congressmen from the State of Minnesota.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Joint Resolution 15

Memorial asking Congress to pass laws that will pay the soldiers' bonus, etc.

Whereas, due to the long-continued depression, thousands of American veterans of the World War are unemployed and without the means of adequate support and are unable to provide the necessities and comforts of life for themselves and their families through no fault of their own; and

Whereas it is the policy of the national administration, in its recovery program, to bring about a distribution of public funds and accomplish wide-spread reemployment; and

Whereas the payment of the remainder of the amount due on the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates held by veterans of the World War will result in a distribution of money to every community in the United States, which money will find its way into every channel of trade through the purchase of necessities and comforts of life, the payments of debts, the building and repairing of homes, the rehabilitation of small business enterprises, and through many other needed expenditures: and through many other needed expenditures; and Whereas the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars have in their respective national conventions overwhelmingly approved the immediate cash payment of said certificates; and

Whereas such certificates constitute a just obligation of the Government to the veterans of the World War: Now, therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Tennessee (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States immediately pass such legislation as is necessary for the immediate payment of the balance due on such adjusted-compensation certificates with the remittance of interest and other charges against the principal sum of such certificates; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Tennes be directed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Joe Byrns, and also that a copy of the same be forwarded to Senators N. L. Bachman and K. D. McKellar, and to each of the nine Members of the United States House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee.

Adopted February 20, 1935.

Walter M. Haynes, Speaker of the House of Representatives. W. P. Moss, Speaker of the Senate.

Approved February 21, 1935.

HILL MCALISTER, Governor.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

House Concurrent Resolution A-6

Memorializing Congress to enact the necessary legislation to insure selection of unbiased Federal jurors

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring): Whereas there has been a great deal of criticism of the manner of selecting jurors for service in the Federal district courts in the

State of North Dakota; and

State of North Dakota; and
Whereas the present plan of selecting jurors in Federal district courts gives to the clerk of the United States district court and the jury commissioner entirely too much opportunity to select jurors personally agreeable to them: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon the Congress of the United States the enactment of the necessary legislation which shall remedy such condition, and which shall provide an impartial, unbiased, and uncontrolled method for selecting Federal jurors; be it further

Resolved, That we recommend for the consideration of Congress the present law with reference to the selection of jurors in the district courts in the State of North Dakota.

WULLIAM M. CROCKETT.

WILLIAM M. CROCKETT Speaker of the House.
Walter S. Martin,
Chief Clerk of the House.
A. S. Marshall, President pro tempore of the Senate.
F. EMANUELL,
Secretary of the Senate.

Dated February 20, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish a national park to be known as the "Lewis and Clark National Park" in Burt, Thurston, and Dakota Counties, Nebr.

Whereas Lewis and Clark made a trip of exploration across the continent in 1803 and opened up a previously unknown terri-

Whereas it is fitting and proper that Lewis and Clark should be honored by a perpetual commemoration; and Whereas there is approximately 75,000 acres along the Missouri River in eastern Burt, Thurston, and Dakota Counties which contains many historical points of interest with respect to the Lewis and Clark expedition; and

Whereas such land is especially adapted for a game refuge and migratory bird sanctuary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska in fiftieth session assembled, 1. That this house respectfully petitions and memorializes the Congress of the United States to establish a national park to be known as "Lewis and Clark National Park" along the Missouri River in Nebraska at historic points touched by Lewis and Clark in 1803 while making their trip agross the continent trip across the continent.

2. That the chief clerk of this house is hereby ordered and directed to forthwith forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed, to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to United States. States Senators representing the State of Nebraska, and to Congressmen in the House of Representatives of the United States representing the State of Nebraska, to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the establishment of a national park in Nebraska to be known as the "Lewis and Clark National Park."

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a telegram from Josephine Tumulty, Jersey City, N. J., stating "Uphold the President; defeat McCarran amendment", which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Crawford County (Iowa) Farm Bureau, favoring the making of an appropriation of $60,000,000 for seed loans to farmers, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of the county of Alameda, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation to remove all unwarranted taxes and obstacles in connection with the distribution of wine, which was referred to the Committee on

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of San Diego, Calif., favoring the prompt enactment of legislation establishing a national oldage pension system, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Magnus Lundberg, New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation inimical to the interest of investors in the securities of public-utility corporations, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Alfred Gooding Guild, Young People's Religious Union of the South Church (Unitarian), of Portsmouth, N. H., favoring the enactment of the so-called "Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill", which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the board of representatives of the city of Tampa, Fla.; the board of commissioners of Salt Lake City, Utah; the common councils of the cities of Stamford, Conn.; Quincy and Springfield, Ill.; Dearborn, Mich.; Clarksdale, Miss.; Okmulgee, Okla.; and Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; the city councils of Worcester, Mass.; and St. Petersburg, Fla.; and Groups Nos. 2200, 1812, and 2313, of Chicago, Ill.; Group No. 1745, of Royalton, Ill.; Group No. 2752, of Bradley, Ohio.; Group No. 2765, of Schenectady, N. Y.; Group No. 334, of Detroit, Mich.; and Group No. 2597, of Groveton, Pa., all of the Polish National Alliance of the United States of North America, favoring the enactment of pending legislation proclaiming October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a petition of sundry citizens of Tuscola County, Mich., praying for the prompt passage of the so-called "Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing bill", which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MALONEY presented resolutions adopted by Group No. 356, of Meriden; Group No. 315, of Bridgeport; Group No. 2158, of Fairfield, and Group No. 2291, of Rockville, all of the Polish National Alliance of the United States of North America, in the State of Connecticut, favoring the enactment of pending legislation proclaiming October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by Wichita Division No. 198, Order of Benefit Association of Railway Employees, Wichita, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation to modify section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to permit railroads to compete with unregulated forms of transportation, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I also present a petition from John Hill and other citizens of Lawrence, Kans., urging passage of the Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill, for reference to the Judiciary Committee.

It is not my intention to detain the Senate, but I do want to place in the RECORD a statement as to my stand in favor of the early passage of this proposed legislation. I have favored this measure for years. Lynchings are a disgrace to our civilization. We know from past experience that local governments have been only measurably successful in coping with this reversion to the barbarism of 20 centuries ago.

The measure itself is reasonable and just. It provides that three or more persons acting together and without authority of law to kill or injure any person in the custody of a peace officer constitute a mob. It declares that a State which fails, neglects, or refuses to give protection to any such person against mobs has denied equal protection of its laws. In case a State fails to indict or prosecute for a lynching, recourse can be had to the Federal courts where judgments against the local governmental unit up to $10,000 may be obtained.

Lynching is more than anarchy; more than a crime against the individual victim. It is moral degradation for those who participate. It is an education in savagery for the younger generation. It is a reversion to barbarism, and has no place in our society. The cumulative effect on the people of the community where lynchings occur is a most serious menace to society itself. I take this occasion to express the hope that the Judiciary Committee will submit an early and favorable report on the measure, and that it will be enacted into law at the present session of Congress.

(The petition presented by Mr. CAPPER from John Hill and other citizens of Lawrence, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called "Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill", was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.)

RESOLUTIONS REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE TO AUDIT AND CONTROL THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, without amendment, four resolutions and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions reported by the Senator from South Carolina will be considered in their order.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

The resolution (S. Res. 81) submitted by Mr. Ashurst on the 15th instant and reported this day by Mr. Byrnes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer caths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

ASSISTANT CLERKS, COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE

The resolution (S. Res. 25) submitted by Mr. Copeland on January 7, 1935, and reported this day by Mr. Byrnes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is authorized to employ until July 1, 1935, an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

NELLIE SNYDER

The resolution (S. Res. 85) submitted by Mr. Schwellen-BACH on the 18th instant and reported this day by Mr. BYRNES from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Nellie Snyder, widow of Nevin Snyder, late an assistant clerk to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

The resolution (S. Res. 87) submitted by Mr. Connally on the 20th instant and reported this day by Mr. Byrnes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not seveny-tourch Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

ADMINISTRATION OF CODES UNDER THE N. R. A.

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with additional amendments, Senate Resolution 79, and, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 35, I ask unanimous consent for their consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first resolution will be read. The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 79) submitted by Mr. Nye and Mr. McCarran on the 14th instant, as follows:

Whereas the National Industrial Recovery Act, as a temporary measure, has been in operation for nearly 2 years and will expire by limitation of time on June 16, 1935; and

Whereas proposals will soon be pending before the Congress for an extension of the act or for the enactment of new legislation in lieu of it; and

Whereas the Congress should be guided in its deliberations by the practical experience of the last 2 years; and

Whereas numerous charges have been made of injustice, oppression, and favoritism in the administration of the codes of the several industries; and

Whereas the charges include, among others, the following

1. That small enterprises are oppressed and their continued existence jeopardized;
2. That wage scales and the rights of the workers are being ignored or subordinated in the competitive battle of the strong to seize the markets of the weak;

That in some industries the code authorities are dominated by certain elements of the industry, and are using their powers for the oppression of other elements;

4. That they are energetically using their usurped powers to accomplish the centralization of industry and to prevent its decentralization;

5. That hordes of paid investigators and inquisitors travel over the country practicing unlawful searches and seizures;
6. That in certain cases the administrators themselves have not hesitated openly to suspend or revoke the law for the benefit of favored individuals;

7. That even among the nonfavored elements of industry there is discrimination in this respect; that the strong are able to resist aggression while the weak must submit;

aggression while the weak must submit;

8. That, possessing vast and extralegal powers, code authorities have made trivial demands which cannot be ignored, under pain of economic death, and have compelled the accused to travel vast distances with their witnesses and records to remote places to vindicate themselves;

9. That under the pretense of enforcing wage provisions the code authorities and the administrators have declared and are putting into effect a policy of regulating production costs without reference to wage scales;

to wage scales;

10. That by means of the usurped power of fixing production costs they are indirectly fixing prices to the consumer;
11. That code authorities have usurped the legislative function

11. That code authorities have usurped the legislative function and have issued floods of new legislation under the guise of rules, regulations, and interpretations;

12. That such rules, regulations, and interpretations are deliberately designed to affect adversely the unfavored elements and to leave unaffected the favored elements of industry;

13. That the torrent of rules, regulations, and interpretations has been deliberately designed to be vague, indefinite, and uncertain in order that the codes may mean anything or nothing in the unlimited discretion and untrammeled will of the code authorities;

14. That many of these vague rules, regulations, and interpretations have been retroactive in character; that industry has been compelled to guess at its peril; and individuals have been charged with serious offenses for violation of supposed laws which were not and could not have been anticipated;

and could not have been anticipated;

15. That a wealth of statistical information is obtained from members of industry for the use and guidance of code authorities; that this information is available to the dominant elements and is withheld from those who would resist their domination;

16. That protected by code provisions for the confidential nature of information thus obtained, the operations of the code authorities are shrouded in mystery which the unfavored elements are unable to penetrate;

17. That in certain instances important amendments to codes have been obtained and approved of which the industry at large was in total ignorance for many months;

18. That when just complaints have been made to the administration the administrators have investigated the conduct of istration the administrators have investigated the conduct of themselves and of their collaborating code authorities; that such investigations have been secretly conducted, and the complaining themselves and of their collaborating code authorities; that such investigations have been secretly conducted, and the complaining elements never called upon to produce evidence or informed that the investigation was in progress;

19. That section 4 (b) of the National Industrial Recovery Act (now expired by limitation) provided the conditions under which the President may require that no person shall engage in any trade or industry without first obtaining a license; that in defiance of the clear intent of the act certain industrial codes provide that all commodities produced shall bear an N. R. A. label; that the privilege of using such label shall be granted upon application to the code authority; that the privilege of using such label may be withdrawn in respect of any manufacturer whose operations, after hearing by the code authority and review by the Administrator, shall be found to be in substantial violation of the code; that this in effect constitutes the code authority and the Administrator a licensing authority; that some retail codes contain an absolute prohibition of the sale by any merchant of any commodity the code of whose industry requires a label unless the label of such industry be thereto affixed; that this system of legalized boycott places the manufacturer at the absolute mercy of the code authority and the Administrator; that a standardized practice has evolved under which a person aggrieved by a ruling of the code authority may appeal to the Administrator for redress, but that as a condition of obtaining a hearing of his grievances he must agree in advance to be bound by the decision of the Administrator and walve his right to resort to the judicial process: advance to be bound by the decision of the Administrator and waive his right to resort to the judicial process;

20. That, notwithstanding the provision of the Constitution of the United States that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, code authorities have assumed and are exercising the power to levy taxes on industries and are enforcing collection thereof by duress;

21. That code authority administration in many cases has lost all semblance of a rule of law and has become a rule of men, bent upon the oppression of their weaker competitors; and

Whereas if the conditions charged obtain to any considerable extent the Congress should have full knowledge of them to guide it in the formulation of new legislation; and

Whereas all friends of labor and all well-wishers for the success of the industrial-recovery program recognize that the correction of abuses is a necessary condition to the success of the program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the subject matter of this resolution be referred to the Senate Committee on Commerce and that said committee be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report upon the subject matter of this resolution.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold hearings; to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted; to require by subpens or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman. approved by the chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this is the resolution which pertains to an investigation of certain charges against the N. R. A. It was first referred to the Committee on Finance, reported by that committee, and then referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. With reference to the matter, we are in such situation that I think, if the resolution is going to be adopted, it should be adopted promptly; of course, if it is not going to be adopted, that is all right.

The Committee on Finance is ready to proceed with the proposed investigation. We are also ready to proceed with a measure along the lines of the President's recent message involving certain changes in the N. R. A. law. The results of the proposed investigation ought to be before the Senate when we begin to consider N. R. A. legislation. I had hoped to call the Committee on Finance together in the morning to lay our plans for consideration of the situation. If there is any delay of the proposed investigation, the committee will proceed to begin to write legislation, in accordance with the suggestions of the President, so we may get something before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi what allowance the committee made with reference to expenses?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the committee reduced the amount from $25,000 to $5,000. The Committee on Finance did not make any recommendation with reference to the expenditure.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the opinion of the committee that $5,000 is adequate for a full investigation?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there is any doubt that it is sufficient for the present. As the Senator knows, the Finance Committee has rather broad powers with reference to these matters.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, has there been reported this morning another resolution authorizing an investigation of N. R. A. by the Judiciary Committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not as yet been laid before the Senate, but the Chair is advised that it is on the desk, reported this morning by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. NYE. For the information of the Senate, I think it ought to be made clear that the action of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran] in asking that the resolution which has been reported go over, was occasioned by the thought that two resolutions are being reported this morning calling for two separate and distinct investigations of N. R. A. It has been thought that there might be some advantage in a consolidation of the two resolutions. The request that the resolution go over was occasioned quite entirely by the desire. as I understand, to afford an opportunity for Senators interested to get together and endeavor to devise a plan of consolidating the two resolutions.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senate might today recess over a day or two. My committee is anxious to get to work on the matter. We are going to proceed, if the resolution is not adopted, to the consideration of the changes in the N. R. A. law suggested by the President. It seems to me the resolution ought to be before the committee when we proceed and thus enable us to kill two birds with one stone. It is inconceivable that there should be any delay about the matter. Let the resolution be adopted and the investigation be undertaken by the Finance Committee, and then, if Senators want to make some effort later to consolidate the two investigations, that will be all right. I have no objection to the other committee proceeding with an investigation along monopolistic lines.

Mr. NYE. There might be a desire on the part of another committee which is concerned with the other resolution yet to be reported from the desk. I would suggest that before we pass definitely upon the resolution now before the Senate, the second resolution be reported so that the Senator from Nevada may have a chance then to make his point more clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As there has been objection to the consideration of Senate Resolution 79, it will go over.

Mr. NYE. Very well.

MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES AND ANTITRUST LAWS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The second resolution reported by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes] will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 35) submitted by Mr. King on January 7, 1935, and reported this day by Mr. Byrnes from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Whereas to prevent monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade and efforts to obtain monopolistic control of trade and commerce, laws were enacted by the Congress which are still in force; and

Whereas it is claimed that such laws have not been enforced and that monopolies have increased and monopolistic control of industry has been strengthened; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the enactment of said antitrust laws, it is alleged that the National Industrial Recovery Act has been construed as permitting monopolies and pro tanto repeals the said antitrust laws; and

Whereas it is alleged that the said antitrust laws are inadequate to meet monopolistic developments and should therefore be strengthened in order that the purpose for which they were enacted might be realized: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to conduct an investigation to determine (1) whether the National Industrial Recovery Act has encouraged or promoted monopolistic practices; (2) whether the National Industrial Recovery Act or rules, regulations, and codes issued under it have tended to nullify the antitrust laws; (3) whether, in that event, legislation is needed to restore the antitrust laws to the position which they occupied prior to the date of enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act; and (4) whether the antitrust laws, if properly enforced are adequate to control monopolistic practices.

The committee shall report as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses until the final report is submitted; to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask to have both resolutions go over for 1 day, all with a view of getting together with other Senators in order to provide for one investigation, presumably and preferably by a select committee, thus to save duplication of investigation and also to save money.

A select committee, in my judgment, would be able to get to work immediately on the investigation. I am very anxious, as one of the proponents of one of the resolutions, to have the investigation go forward at once. It was with that idea in mind that I wanted the resolution to go over for 1 day in order that we might get together and have concerted action on the whole matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Two resolutions having been submitted, and the two resolutions having been reported this morning, is there any parliamentary way for the Senator from Nevada to move to combine the two?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not today. The resolutions must go over 1 day under the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Would there be a way tomorrow for him to do so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi whether he may ask for action tomorrow on the resolutions?

Mr. HARRISON. The parliamentary inquiry is, two resolutions providing for two separate investigations having been submitted, one calling for an investigation by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and the other for an investigation by the Finance Committee, would it be in order tomorrow, under the rule, for a motion to be made to combine the two and have a select committee conduct the investigation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any amendment to either of the resolutions will be in order when they come before the Senate. The Chair believes that answers the Senator's parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 83. An act to provide for the conservation and settlement of estates of absentees and absconders in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

H. R. 3477. An act relating to the incorporation of Trinity College of Washington, D. C., organized under and by virtue of a certificate of incorporation pursuant to the incorporation laws of the District of Columbia, as provided in subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia:

H. R. 4538. An act to change the designation of Lefler

Place to Second Place; and

H. R. 5711. An act to provide pensions for needy blind persons of the District of Columbia and authorizing appropriations therefor.

DR. CHESTER C. GROFF

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the message received this morning from the House of Representatives advises the Senate that the House has passed without amendment the bill (S. 31) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. Groff.

The House and the Senate have passed identical bills in this matter. I move that the bill (H. R. 4996) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. Groff be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

UNLAWFUL ENTRY ON PRIVATE PROPERTY

Mr. KING. Mr. President, some days ago the Senate passed Senate bill 402, which has since passed the House of Representatives with very unimportant amendments. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 402) to amend section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, which were, on page 1, line 8, after "dwelling", to insert "or building"; and on page 2, line 2, after "dwelling", to insert "or building."

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WORK RELIEF PROGRAM-TELEGRAM OF SENATOR GORE

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain telegraphic correspondence between certain citizens of Oklahoma and the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore], and also a brief newspaper item.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

McAlester, Okla., February 22, 1935.

Hon. T. P. GORE,

United States Senate: Several thousand Pittsburg County unemployed people assembled in convention demand you support President Roosevelt's $4,000,-000,000 relief measure. If you vote against measure sentiment is, you stay out of this county in next senatorial race.

Mayor Hartshorne, Chairman of Committee.

C. B. LINDSAY,

Mayor of Haileyville, Okla.

FEBRUARY 23, 1935.

Hon. JOE A. BROWN, . Joe A. Brown,
Mayor of Hartshorne,
Chairman Committee on Unemployed,
McAlester, Okla.,

Mayor of Haileyville,

Haileyville, Okla.:

This will acknowledge your exceedingly diplomatic and hospitable telegram. It shows how the dole spoils the soul. Your telegram intimates that your votes are for sale. Much as I value votes I am not in the market. I cannot consent to buy votes with the people's money. I owe a debt to the taxpayer as well as to the unemployed. I shall discharge both. None but the bully resorts to threats and none but the coward yields to them.

United States Senator.

Senator Gore, of Oklahoma has won a reputation for saity comment, for it often has a sharp sting to it.

A Washington hostess was describing to him the other evening the so-called "dragon-lizard" at the National Zoological Park.

"Why, Senator", she said, "that lizard has a yellow tongue 7 inches long that he shoots out of his mouth."

"Good gracious", interrupted the Senator. "I hope he doesn't go to Oklahoma and run for the United States Senate."

THE N. R. A. AND SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Almarin Phillips & Son, of Port Jervis, N. Y., with reference to the price of roofing materials; and, bearing on the same subject matter, an editorial entitled "Taps for the Blue Eagle", which appeared in the Philadelphia Record of February 21, 1935.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., February 25, 1935.

Senator W. E. BORAH. Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see by the New York Times that you are engaged in an effort to revive the action of the antitrust laws. Would state an enort to revive the action of the antitrust laws. Would state that I have been in the wholesale asphalt roofing business for some time and I have never seen a time when the trade was so absolutely tied up, and with the present rules of the association, which practically takes in all of the United States, with the exception of two firms furnishing the mail-order houses, we will be put out of business and, at the same time, the companies are making enormous profits. A 10-inch square butt shingle that we have bought for about $3.15 delivered today will cost us over $4.50 delivered and, at the same time, the mail-order houses are selling the same shingle to a consumer at $4.50. The companies are making such tremendous profits that they will hold together in a penelty-bound deal ing such tremendous profits that they will hold together in a penalty-bound deal.

My son, who is president of the Mayors' Association of the State of New York, is in Chicago conferring with the mayors' associations of other States to devise some means by which the municipalities of the United States can buy goods without paying such tremendous figures. If you will confer with Mayor LaGuardia, of New York City, on the fire-hose situation, you will be astounded at the capacity and gall for price situation, a price situation which leaves enough profit for a tremendous graft to be paid and yet holds the cities up to an awful price.

We wish you the best of success in your endeavor to enforce some of the antitrust laws, because when the manufacturers get together in a deal like these deals they do not seem to stop at a reasonable price.

reasonable price. Very truly yours,

ALMARIN PHILLIPS & SON, ALMARIN PHILLIPS.

[From the Philadelphia Record, Feb. 21, 1935] TAPS FOR THE BLUE EAGLE

N. R. A. must be abandoned. Reluctant as Congress may be to take that step, no other sound course is open.

course is open.

Instead of continuing N. R. A., let Congress embody a minimum-wage law and a maximum-hour law in the Federal statutes—And jettison all the rest of the code claptrap, the complicated and often impossible trade-practice regulations, the price fixing, and various other devices through which N. R. A. has fostered monopoly instead of curbing it.

In his message to Congress, President Roosevelt enumerates various weaknesses of N. R. A. which he believes should be remedied. When one takes into consideration the many other weaknesses which the President does not mention—weaknesses in N. R. A. ad-

When one takes into consideration the many other weaknesses which the President does not mention—weaknesses in N. R. A. administration as well as weaknesses of the law itself—
There can be only one logical conclusion:
To drop this "noble experiment", go back where we were before it was launched, and start afresh.
"Don't trifle with that bird!"
This ominous reference of General Johnson to the blue eagle was a vain warning. The "bird" has been trifled with on every hand—by business men and public officials, by those charged with enforcing N. R. A., as well as those who opposed it from the start. Thus, today the Blue Eagle lies pitifully battered and mangled, far back on the high road to recovery. And the one humane thing to do is to put it out of the way, not let it suffer.
General Johnson's phrase is typical of the high hopes held for N. R. A. in its early days. Those initial effects were beneficial beyond question.

beyond question.

Subsequent operation of N. R. A., however, has been a backward movement instead of a forward movement.

For business, there has been increasing unwarranted interference in its affairs, mounting proof of the impossibility of running the complex commercial structure of the country from a bureau in Washington.

For labor the supposed guaranties of section 7 (a) have not been realized. Instead, N. R. A. often has served to interfere with labor's efforts to better working conditions. Appeals taken to the various labor boards have ended either in deadlock or fruitless compromise. And even where labor won victories through N. R. A. agencies, those victories have been nullified time and again by other Government agencies.

For the public, N. R. A. has failed to fulfill its promise of putting more men to work at higher wages to restore purchasing power.

A few figures will show just how N. R. A. has gone backward

The President's original reemployment agreement set a $12 minimum wage. That was rock-bottom pay. And it was understood at the time that the various codes would increase that minimum.

Instead, code after code has chiseled down the $12 figure. That of the rubber-tire industry set a minimum wage of $10. That of excelsior products, $8. In the textile bag code it is $8.60. In retail grocery trades, $10 for 56 hours. In the wholesale grocery trade, $9 for 44 hours. In the cleaning and dyeing industry, $8; handkerchief makers, $9; banking, $12. The laundry code for the South hit bottom with $5.60 for 40 hours' work. And only last week the cigarette code set a minimum wage of $10.

Meanwhile, income-tax records show more returns filed for incomes above $25,000 and less for incomes below $25,000.

The American Federation of Labor reported in January that average wages of the 16 chief producing and distributing industries rose only 3 cents from $20.53 a week in November 1932 to $20.56 a week in November 1933.

Food prices, on the other hand, rose 7 percent, clothing and Food prices, on the other hand, rose 7 percent, clothing and furnishings, 21 percent. Thus, real wages actually went down in a year in which corporation and individual profits expanded substantially.

Finally, while N. R. A. is estimated to have originally restored 4,000,000 men to employment, the trend of employment has been gradually downward over the past 10 months.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. N. R. A. can be judged only by its fruits.

Particularly, when hope after hope, promise after promise, has gone unfulfilled.

That is why the Record believes Congress should act at once, and abolish N. R. A. before it carries us farther backward in our fight for recovery.

That is why the Record believes we must substitute the fundamental economic protection of a minimum-wage law and a

With labor left to stand on its own feet and business left to stand on its own feet.

Labor then will be free to fight its battles without Government interference.

Industry likewise will be free to solve its problems—free to go back on the basis of open competition which is the essence of capitalism.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 944) to amend section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act was announced as first in order.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 243) for the relief of Curtis Jett was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 244) for the relief of Thomas Salleng was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment to enable me to make a brief statement?

Mr. KING. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I happen to know Mr. Salleng personally. He is one of the finest law-abiding citizens of whom I know. He was in the Philippine Insurrection. He was in a number of engagements in the Philippines. After the troops came home he was sent somewhere to the Middle Northwest, to Minnesota, I believe. He heard that his mother was sick and so he went home. He was marked as a deserter. No effort was ever made to capture him; but being a man of considerable conscience his action troubled him, so sometime afterward he went back to the Army post, hunted up the officer in charge, surrendered himself, served his term, and was discharged.

The Committee on Military Affairs under such circumstances has long made it a practice, where a man has had honorable discharge be removed; and I trust the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the words "on the", to strike out "13th day of July 1903", and insert "11th day of September 1905", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Thomas Salleng, who was a member of Company D, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 11th day of September 1905: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1266) for the relief of Robert E. Masters was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1404) to promote the efficiency of national defense was announced as next in order.

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, yesterday when the cal endar was under consideration the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] asked that this bill go over. In view of the fact that he desires to study the bill more thoroughly, I ask that it go over at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN CARMICHAEL WILLIAMS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1082) for the reinstatement of John Carmichael Williams in the United States Navy, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to restore John Carmichael Williams, late a lieutenant, United States Navy, as an officer in the Navy with the rank and precedence which he held on May 22, 1931: Provided, That the said John Carmichael Williams shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by the usual examination for such grade, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties thereof: Provided further, That the said John Carmichael Williams shall be carried as additional to the number of the grade to which he may be restored or at any time thereafter promoted, and he shall not be entitled to receive pay or allowances for the period during which he was not in the active service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas explain this bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, ordinarily bills such as this are not favorably considered. This man happens to be an expert in aviation, as I explained in the last Congress when a bill similar to this passed the Senate; and there is a special need for officers of this type.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 213) to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909, 35 Statutes 1109 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 203), and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before this bill is disposed of I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. CONNALLY (and other Senators). Let it go over. The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PICKWICK LANDING DAM, TENN.

The bill (S. 1506) to change the name of the Pickwick Landing Dam to Quin Dam was announced as next in order. Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the reason for this change of name? Why is Congress troubled with legisbattle service, to recommend that the disability of a dis- | lation changing the name of a dam from "Pickwick" to " Quin "?

> Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to have that bill go over.

> Mr. ROBINSON. It might be appropriate to change it from "Pecksniff" to some other Dickens' name.

> Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the author of the bill, I may say in a word that Quin is the name of a former Representative from Mississippi; and as chairman of the conference committee having to do with the Muscle Shoals project I served a great many years with Mr. Quin. He was very active, very purposeful and alert in the consideration of the legislation, and I think it is appropriate to his memory that this change should be made in the name of this dam.

> Mr. ROBINSON. Can the Senator tell us who was the Pickwick" after whom the landing was first named?

> Mr. McNARY. I am just taking up another Senator's task. I see that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRIsonl is here.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this dam is in Tennessee, and I have received a number of protests against changing its name. I have asked the Senator from Mississippi to let the bill go over, and I hope that will be done.

I knew Mr. Quin very well, indeed. I esteemed him very highly. He was a very fine man, and I was very sorry to learn of his untimely death. At the same time, there are protests from my State against the passage of the bill, and I shall have to examine into the matter before the bill is passed. Therefore I should like to have it go over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for just a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I heard the statement of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary], the leader of the other side, and I appreciate very much his complimentary expressions with reference to the late Representative Quin. All of us are familiar with the fine record he made in the House and the very able service he rendered in connection with the particular legislation involving the development of Muscle Shoals. I will not say that he rendered more service than did the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] or some other Senators here whose hearts were in that legislation; but certainly no Member of the House ever manifested more zeal, ability, and perseverance in bringing about the development of Muscle Shoals than did Representative Quin. As Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House and as a member of the conference committee he was one of the strong pillars upon which the legislation rested.

Of course, I shall not move to take up the bill at this time. because I am sure the Senator from Tennessee desires to cooperate in the matter, and I am sure the protests that have come to him were only protests from some of his constituents who dislike to see an old name such as "Pickwick Landing" changed after it has existed in a community for a long time. The protests are not because there is any particular objection to changing the name of the dam to Quin, but just because some of those in the community would like to retain the name "Pickwick Landing." So I shall not move to consider the bill, hoping that the Senator will permit me to have it considered later by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President-

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Texas. Mr. CONNALLY. Has the name "Pickwick Landing" any special significance, or is the desire to retain it based upon the fact that the landing has borne that name for a long while?

Mr. HARRISON. It is just a name that has been given to this landing for a long time, long before there was ever any project to build a dam there.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi indulge me further?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to concur in what the Senator from Mississippi has said with regard to the eminent and valuable services of the late Representative Quin with regard to Muscle Shoals.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, perhaps Dickens crossed the river at that place when he visited the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Probably so. Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to make it plain that in requesting an explanation of the bill, I did not know that it was the intention to name the dam after the late Representative Quin.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it is. Mr. ROBINSON. I, too, recognize the ability he displayed, and his patient and faithful service while a Member of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator will recall, one of the dams was named after President Wilson; another was named after the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]; and I thought it most appropriate that this dam should be named after the Member of the House who rendered the greatest service in that body in this matter. This dam will be the nearest to the Mississippi line of any of those that are to be erected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

FILLING OF VACANCIES IN CERTAIN JUDGESHIPS

The bill (S. 481) authorizing the filling of vacancies in certain judgeships was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as

Be it enacted, etc., That any existing vacancy and any vacancy which may occur at any time hereafter in any of the following United States district judgeships created by the act of September 14, 1922 (42 Stat., ch. 306, sec. 1, p. 837; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 3), and the act of March 2, 1925 (43 Stat., ch. 397, secs. 1-3, p. 1098; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 4), are hereby authorized to be filled: 2 in the district of Massachusetts; 2 in the southern district of New York; 1 in the eastern district of New York; 1 in the western district of Pennsylvania; 1 in the eastern district of Michigan; 1 in the eastern district of Missouri; 1 in the western district of Missouri; 1 in the northern district of Ohio; 1 in the southern district of California; 1 in the district of Minnesota; 1 in the northern district of Texas; 1 in the district of Arizona, and 1 in the southern district of Iowa. of Arizona, and 1 in the southern district of Iowa.

ALVA A. MURPHY

The bill (S. 170) for the relief of Alva A. Murphy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, undoubtedly Senators are familiar with the fact that a number of representatives of the Government have been wounded or killed in the enforcement of the prohibition laws as well as in the enforcement of other laws. It does not seem to me quite proper that we should single out one case; and in this instance, as I read the report, Mr. Murphy really was not in the employ of the Government.

As I say, it is rather singular that we should single out one case and grant compensation. It seems to me the whole question should be dealt with in a rather general way; and I suggest that this bill go over, only for the purpose of having the whole subject receive attention, because I think perhaps there should be some compensation.

I may say in passing that quite recently one of the finest citizens of my State, an officer who participated in the capture of one of the most dangerous of the public enemies, was shot and killed. Suggestions have been made that his family should receive some compensation; and, in view of the fact that there are a number of these cases, I ask that this bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

RETIREMENT OF ACTING ASSISTANT SURGEONS OF THE NAVY

The bill (S. 883) directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 64 years was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] to state the changes which this bill makes in existing law?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this is one of the few bills on the calendar which are in the interest of economy. There are now two acting assistant surgeons on active duty in the Navy who have reached the age of 64 years. In fact, both are over 70 years of age, and one is an invalid. They have been in the service since 1898. The Navy Department recommends their retirement, and promises not to fill the vacancies; so by retiring these two officers, instead of paying them their present salaries-they having become old and somewhat infirm—the Government will pay only the retirement pay and save about $4,416 a year.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. If these surgeons are on the regular list, why do they not retire at the age of 64 anyway? Is not that the general law?

Mr. WALSH. It is true that that is the general law, but it does not apply to these men. That is why there has to be a special bill

Mr. CONNALLY. Are they regular commissioned officers or civilian employees?

Mr. WALSH. They are what are known as "temporary naval officers" in distinction from permanent naval officers.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the point, then. Why should we extend the retirement privilege to civilian employees of the Navy Department while all other civilian employees have to retire under the regular civilian retirement law?

Mr. WALSH. Were they permanent naval officers, they would be retired. No provision of law provides for the retirement of temporary naval officers.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure; but they are not regular naval officers. Why should we extend the retirement privileges of naval officers to men who are not naval officers, but who are simply civilian employees of the Navy Department? Mr. WALSH. But the alternative is that they will stay on their jobs and be paid much more than their retired pay.

Mr. CONNALLY. They will supposedly be doing some work if they stay on their jobs. I do not like to object to the Senator's bill, but I do think this is a very serious departure from the usual practice.

Mr. WALSH. Let me say that this is not my bill. I do not know the two individuals who will be retired. The bill is recommended by the Navy Department. I have no personal interest in the two acting assistant surgeons.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator? Might not the passage of this bill be construed as a precedent for granting like privileges to other civilians?

Mr. WALSH. It might if there were any other acting assistant surgeons in the Navy who would be eligible. They are the only two who are left of those who, under special act of Congress in 1898, were appointed as temporary naval officers.

Mr. KING. I mean, in other departments where civilians have been employed, might not this be regarded as a precedent? If we should grant retirement privileges to civilians who happen to be in the Navy, why not grant retirement privileges to civilians who may be in other departments of the Government?

Mr. WALSH. Of course retirement privileges are granted to many civilians in various branches of the Government service.

Mr. KING. I know that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not at three-fourths pay, however.

Mr. WALSH. That is true. This retirement will simply place these surgeons in the same status as regular commissioned medical officers who are given the retirement privileges.

Mr. CONNALLY. If this bill were passed, though, why would not the employees of the Public Health Service have the same right to retirement when they get to be 64 years of age, and the employees of all the other departments?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know what the law is with regard to retirements in the Public Health Service. In view of the interrogatories of the Senators, the bill can go over until I receive further information from the Navy Department.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask that the bill go over, Mr. President. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

A. C. MESSLER CO.

The bill (S. 313) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of A. C. Messler Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection for a moment, but I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations. It is an old claim.

Mr. WHITE. That is quite true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator when the claim first arose. I have not had an opportunity to read the report.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if I may, I will make a very brief statement with respect to the claim.

The bill authorizes the Court of Claims to assume jurisdiction and to hear and determine this claim notwithstanding the lapse of time. In the last Congress a bill was presented providing for the payment of some $16,000 in settlement of this claim. The measure was fully considered by the Committee on Claims, and the amount was reduced from $16,000 to between twelve and thirteen thousand dollars. In that form the bill was favorably reported to the Senate, and was passed by the Senate.

The claim arises out of a contract entered into during the war by which the claimant company agreed to manufacture and deliver to the Government some 15,000,000 cartridge clips. The contract between the Government and the claimant was executed in several forms. It is a matter of regret that the forms were not all the same. There were words appearing on one form of the executed contract which did not appear in another. There were words stricken out in one form of the contract which were not stricken out in another. There were interlineations in some of the contracts. So there was presented a very confusing question as to the precise obligation entered into by the Government.

The Committee on Claims reached the conclusion that, upon a proper interpretation of the contract, the Government was obligated to furnish the contractors so many pounds of copper and so many pounds of spelter per 1,000 clips of cartridges at a designated price.

The specifications, which were attached to the contract, provided that there should be furnished 19 pounds per 1,000 clips. As a matter of fact, the Government furnished only 17 pounds per 1,000 clips, and the question is whether the obligation rested on the contractor to go into the open market and buy the 2 pounds of metal per thousand clips—which it did at a cost of something over $16,000—or whether a proper interpretation of the contract placed on the Government the obligation of furnishing the entire amount of metal necessary to perform the contract.

The committee in the last Congress gave very searching attention to this question, and we reached the conclusion then that the obligation was on the Government.

It has seemed wise, because of difficulties the bill encountered elsewhere, to transfer this whole question of the proper interpretation of the contract to the Court of Claims, rather than to attempt to pass upon it here. I have explained the matter as well as I can.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is an old claim, originating, as the Senator has said, away back in the time of the war. The Senator will remember that we set up the Dent Board, and other instrumentalities, for the determination of claims against the Government which contractors and individuals might have growing out of services or alleged services during the war. I find on page 7 of the report the following:

The claim has been considered and denied by the Claims Board, Ordnance Department, and by the War Department Board of Contract Adjustment.

And the places where the decisions are given are cited.

The latter board denied the claim on the theory that, under the terms of the contract, the Government was obligated to furnish only 17 pounds of metal per 1,000 clips manufactured. An appeal was taken to the Secretary of War, as authorized under the Dent Act, who on December 4, 1920, affirmed and approved the decision of the Board of Contract Adjustment denying relief.

The citation is given, Eighth Decisions Appeal Section, War Department Claims Board, 221—

Apparently the case has never been before the Court of Claims.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator is correct; but the fact remains that the Committee on Claims, after a most thorough investigation of this matter, and a consideration of the terms of the various drafts of the contract, reached a conclusion diametrically opposite to that reached by the authorities of the War Department, and it did seem entirely proper, in those circumstances, that the Court of Claims should pass upon the legal questions involved.

I think the proper interpretation of the contract determines this case. It is a legal question, and the Committee on Claims felt unanimously that the legal question should be passed upon by the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims of the United States be, and hereby is, given jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the A. C. Messler Co., of Providence, R. I., notwithstanding lapse of time or any statute of limitations, and to award said company compensation for additional material furnished the Government under contract dated April 17, 1918, for the manufacture and delivery of cartridge clips.

MACK COPPER CO.

The bill (S. 1878) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Mack Copper Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

TERESA DE PREVOST

The bill (S. 1360) for the relief of Teresa de Prevost was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

UNION SHIPPING & TRADING CO., LTD.

The bill (S. 741) for the relief of the Union Shipping & Trading Co., Ltd., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of this measure. In the absence of explanation, I ask that it go over

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM J. COCKE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 941) for the relief of William J. Cocke, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after "$9,116.88", to insert the words "in full settlement of all claims against the Government", and on page 2, after line 1, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William J. Cocke, of North Carolina, the sum of $9.116.88 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for losses growing out of contracts with the War Department, one dated July 1, 1918, for the purchase of garbage from Camp Green, situate at or near the city of Charlotte, N. C., and the other dated September 3, 1918, for Camp Wadsworth, situate at or near the city of Spartanburg, S. C.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. BECK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 457) for the relief of John W. Beck, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to summon John W. Beck, a first lieutenant, United States Army, retired, before a retiring board to inquire whether at the time of his retirement under section 24b, National Defense Act, as amended, he was incapacitated for active service, and whether such incapacity was a result of an incident of service; and if, as a result of such inquiry, it is found that he was so incapacitated, the President is authorized to nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said John W. Beck a first lieutenant, Regular Army, and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Army, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for officers of the Regular Army: Provided, That the said John W. Beck shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs, after studying this matter, reached the conclusion that the mental condition of this man might have had something to do with the shortcomings which led to his being placed in class B, and the committee feels that consideration by a special board would be justified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK KROEGEL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 51) for the relief of Frank Kroegel, alias Francis Kroegel, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Frank Kroegel, alias Francis Kroegel, who was a member of Company M, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably dishereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 22d day of July 1898, and notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pensions, approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act of May 11, 1908: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, Frank Kroegel was a soldier who enlisted, I believe, in 1898. He was then a boy 17 years old, a musician. He was in the Army at a concentration camp a few weeks, when one of his pals died of typhoid fever. This scared Kroegel considerably, so he thought he would go home and explain the matter to his father. He did so, and his father took him to the nearest Army post and surrendered him to the officer there, and the officer sent him to another. He apparently reenlisted, although he did not know that for many years afterward, but he did go back into the Army, and when he was marked a deserter, he was really in the service in another regiment.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the age of the soldier at the time?

Mr. LOGAN. Seventeen, and not very bright. After he served in the new regiment a while, a board examined him, and they said that nearly everything was the matter with him, that he was totally blind, and that he should not have been received in the Army at all. Notwithstanding that, in stating that he should never have been admitted into the Army at any time.

Under all these circumstances, it seemed to us that the man had never been a deserter according to the records, and ought to have the charge of desertion removed from his

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA S. CARRIGAN

The bill (H. R. 3373) for the relief of Anna S. Carrigan was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Anna S. Carrigan, widow of Clarence Carrigan, late American consul at Montevideo, Uruguay, the sum of $7,000, being 1 year's salary of her deceased husband, who died of illness incurred while in the Consular Service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purposes of this act.

GERMAINE M. FINLEY

The bill (S. 1809) for the relief of Germaine M. Finley was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Germaine M. Finley, widow of James G. Finley, late a Foreign Service officer of the United States at Havre, France, the sum of $2,750, being 1 year's salary of her deceased husband, who died while in the Foreign Service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

INTEREST PAYMENTS ON AMERICAN EMBASSY DRAFTS

The bill (S. 1896) to provide for interest payments on American Embassy drafts was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $44,403.15 is hereby authorized to be appropriated for payment to the individuals and corpoized to be appropriated for payment to the individuals and corporations, or their attorneys in fact in the United States, listed in the report of December 10, 1931, of the Secretary of State to the President, as set forth in Senate Document No. 18, Seventy-second Congress, first session, the amounts specified therein, representing interest at 4¾ percent on certain drafts drawn on the Secretary of State by the American Embassies in Russia and Turkey and transfers which the Embassy in Turkey undertook to make by cable communications to the Secretary of State during the period from 1915 to 1920, payment of which was deferred, and amounting to a total sum of $44,403.15: Provided, That no payment hereunder shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, except at the direction of the Secretary of State: Provided further, That full authority is hereby vested in the Secretary of State to determine, in his discretion, whether payment in whole or in part should be made, withheld, or deferred.

SOPHIE DE SOTA

The bill (H. R. 330) for the relief of Sophie de Sota was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Sophie de Sota, widow of Hernando de Sota, late American consul at Leipzig, Germany, the sum of $6,000, equal to 1 year's salary of her deceased husband, who died of illness incurred while in the Consular Service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

WILLIAM LYONS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1391) for the relief of William Lyons, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after "$1,500", to strike out the words "being the amount" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "representing an amount, after deducting the expense caused to the Government", on line 12, after the word "convicted", to strike out the words "without cost to the Government", so as to make the bill read:

been received in the Army at all. Notwithstanding that, in 1917 or 1918, during the World War, he enlisted again. The doctors examined him at that time and turned him down, in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Lyons, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States, the sum of $1,500, representing an amount, after deducting the expense caused to the Government, of a bail bond filed in the case of United States against Louis L. Ross, and subsequently forfeited when the said Ross failed to appear for trial, although he was later apprehended and convicted: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwith-standing. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ED SYMES AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 1012) for the relief of Ed Symes and wife, Elizabeth Symes, and certain other citizens of the State of Texas was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Ed Symes and wife, Elizabeth Symes; Wade Symes and wife, Pearl Symes; Helen Symes Dodson and husband, D. S. Dodson; Howard Evans and wife, Mary Ann Evans; John L. Jones; and Leslie Stegall, all of McLennan County, Tex.; John L. Jones; and Leslie Stegall, all of McLennan County, Tex.; Mrs. Harry Loyd Lincoln, a widow who resides in the county of Carbon, Pa.; and Albert Symes Hunter, of Panama, Canal Zone, all being the sole heirs at law of Albert Symes and wife, Sally J. Symes, each deceased, their heirs, legal representatives, executors, administrators, and assigns, any statutes of limitation being waived, are hereby authorized to enter suit in the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas for the Waco Division for the amount alleged to be due said claimants from the United States by reason of the alleged neglect and alleged wrongdoing of the officials and engineers of the United States War Department in the location, erection, and construction of a lock and dam on the Brazos River in McLennan County, Tex., in the year 1919; that said lock and dam was so erected and constructed at such a point and in such a manner as to cause the river to overflow and cut a new channel across said lands, the overflow washing all of the soil off of said lands, thereby making it worthless for any purpose. lands, thereby making it worthless for any purpose.

SEC. 2. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said United States District Court for the Western District of Texas to hear and determine all such claims. The action in said court may be presented by a single petition making the United States party defendant, and shall set forth all the facts on which the claimants base their shall set forth all the facts on which the claimants base their claims, and the petition may be verified by the agent or attorney of said claimant; official letters, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found due from the United States to the said claimants by reason of the alleged negligence and erroneous construction of said lock and dam, upon the same principles and under the same measures of liability as in like cases between private parties, and the Government hereby waives its immunity from suit. And said claimants and the United States of America shall have all rights of appeal or writ of error or other remedy as in similar cases between private persons or corporations: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General or the United States attorney in such district, or other representatives of the Department of Justice, to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That such suit shall be begun within 12 months of the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with reference to the bill we have just passed, may I inquire of the Senator from Texas whether the Government, before it constructed the dam, did not make investigations, and have the assent of riparian owners to the construction of the dam?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it is claimed that this was not fully done in this particular case. We merely want the point worked out in the court.

Mr. KING. I cannot conceive that the Government would undertake the construction of a dam which might possibly occasion damage to riparian owners without having some understanding.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In this particular case it was not only a matter of construction, but of the dismantling of a structure by the Government, which occasioned damage for which it is claimed the Government should now pay. We should just like to have the point worked out by the court.

Mr. KING. What year was it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The structure was completed about 1910, and dismantling began about 1917.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

I yield to the Senator from Texas. Mr. KING.

Mr. CONNALLY. I happen to know something about this matter. This improvement is in the immediate vicinity of my home. This was a lock and dam on the Brazos River, which the Government erected in the course of the improvement of that stream. Later on the Government discontinued the dam; and in the meantime the lock and dam operated to raise the channel of the river, and blocked up the natural flow, and the river detoured and went through the lands of the claimants and caused considerable destruction. This was something not foreseen by them, and they had no way of preventing it, because the Government, by its action in building the dam and dismantling the dam, as suggested by the senior Senator from Texas, provoked this damage; and the claimants are absolutely not at fault in any way whatever. They could not prevent the action that was taken.

Mr. SHEPPARD. All we ask, Mr. President, is that these claims be submitted to judicial examination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this claim is hoary with age, and it seems to me the damages are so remote that it would be very unfair to the Government to refer the matter to a court.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. This claim is not as old as would seem to appear from the question of the Senator from Utah, because the damage did not occur immediately when the dam was built. It occurred over a period of years as the result of what the dam had done by filling up the stream through the accumulation of silt, so the damage is comparatively recent. It did not occur as far back as the senior Senator from Texas indicated anyway.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The construction of the dam was completed in 1910, and the damage continued for years.

Mr. CONNALLY. The dam was closed in 1915 or 1916.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Dismantling began about 1917. Mr. CONNALLY. It was several years afterward that the damage occurred.

Mr. KING. If it is possible before we adjourn, I shall enter a motion to reconsider for the purpose of making an investigation to consider the consequences of an act of this kind. It seems to me the Government places itself in jeopardy whenever it builds a dam, for if years and years afterward the river should make a detour, as stated in this case, the result might be to leave the dam high and dry, or it might be affected in a number of ways, and the Government would be liable. Therefore, the Government must be very careful in the construction of dams.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. KING. It was passed, and I shall ask for reconsideration.

EDITH N. LINDQUIST

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 905) for the relief of Edith N. Lindquist, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edith N. Lindquist, chief nurse, United States Navy, the sum of $600 in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for reimbursement for the loss claim against the United States for reimbursement for the loss of certain clothing and other personal effects during the earth-quake and fire at Yokohama, Japan, on September 1, 1923: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. B. DICKINSON

The bill (S. 1694) for the relief of C. B. Dickinson was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it appears that this claim was disallowed by the General Accounting Office and that the sum is now outstanding and being demanded from the Maryland Casualty Co. of Baltimore, surety on the bond of the claimant. The Department of the Interior states that-

Although the claimant was aware, or should have been, of the law contrary to the action taken by him, the Government actually received the benefits of these expenditures, and no objection will be interposed by the Department.

The facts, as it appears from another paragraph in the report, are that the superintendent of certain Indian schools diverted funds appropriated for the construction of a new building to the completion of repairs on other buildings.

Mr. President, I think it is dangerous to permit such action. It leaves to subordinate officers, in such manner as their judgment approves, the privilege of making use of funds the use of which has been expressly limited by Congress. I doubt whether at this time the Senate should pass this bill. Unless some Senator is prepared to move that it be proceeded with, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 285) to reimburse the estate of Mary Agnes Roden was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over. I desire to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, what disposition was made

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection to its consideration was made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. BULKLEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Senate bill 285, to reimburse the estate of Mary Agnes Roden. I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] does not insist on his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,515.48" and insert "$5,000"; and at the end of the bill to add a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Sophie T. Walsh, administratrix of the estate of her deceased sister, Mary Agnes Roden, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for injuries received by said Mary Agnes Roden on December 11, 1926, when a United States mail truck collided with her at Lexington Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, New York City: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of service rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 557) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the evidence before the committee showed any negligence on the part of any of these officers.

Mr. CAPPER. No, Mr. President. The bill was drafted by the War Department and sent to the Congress for passage. The War Department has gone into the question thoroughly. There are a great many miscellaneous claims which should be taken up, and which cannot be paid in any other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the following disbursing officers of the Army of the accounts of the following disbursing officers of the Army of the United States the amounts set opposite their respective names: F. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

RELIEF OF DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The bill (S. 558) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States for the settlement of an individual claim approved by the War Department was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the following disbursing officers of the Army of the United States the amounts set opposite their names: Maj. W. D. Dabney, Finance Department, $106.15; Capt. Francis Egan, Quartermaster Corps, $59.62; Maj. Charles F. Eddy, Finance Department, $68.80; said amounts being public funds for which they are accountable and which comprise minor errors in the computation of pay and allowances due former personnel of the military service and of the National Guard, and which amounts have been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Sec. 2. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Maj. Carl Halla, Finance Department, the sum of $3,083.21, said amount being public funds for which he is accountable and which he paid to Lt. Col. Samuel T. Talbott, United States Army, in settlement of a claim approved for household goods lost while in storage at Platisburg Barracks, N. Y., which claim had been approved by the Secretary of War as required by the act of March 4, 1921 (41 Stat. 1436), and which payment was later disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Sec. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Col. Charles A. Romeyn, Cavalry, United States Army, the sum of $24, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse him for a like amount paid out by him to the Springfield Hospital, Springfield, Vt., for hospitalization of Reserve Officers' Training Corps student, Bertram C. Goodell.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, there are several bills of the same nature as the one just passed which are regular routine bills.

SETTLEMENT OF CERTAIN MISCELLANEOUS CLAIMS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 559) to authorize settlement, allowance, and payment of certain claims, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the following claims and certify the same to Congress:

(a) R. D. Jacques in the amount of $3,332.15 for damage to his furniture, clothing, and effects, and $6,862.50 for damage to his house; Rudolph J. Gasser, $2,341.51 for damage to his house; his house, merchandise, and personal belongings, these three claims being the result of an airplane accident at Chicago, Ill., on April 30, 1932, when an Army airplane piloted by Second Lt. Charles A. Fargo, Air Corps Reserve, on an authorized flight, crashed into the house of Mr. Jacques, killing the pilot and his passenger and setting fire to the building in which the claimants were then living. were then living.

(b) Catalina Portugal de Marino, for damages in the amount of $1,000 due to the death of her husband, Ramon Marino, who was killed by the propeller of an Army airplane while assisting in releasing the plane from the mire at Legaspi, Philippine Islands, releasing the plane from the mire at Legaspi, Philippine Islands, on January 10, 1932.

(c) W. H. Williamson, Paulsboro, N. J., for damages in the amount of $20.69 to bread and pastries due to sand and water from the body of a soldier drowned in the Delaware River at Penns Grove, N. J., on July 1, 1931, which was transported in claimant's wagon at the request of an Army sergeant, as an emergency measure, to the nearest medical aid in an effort to save life.

(d) Corp. Joseph R. Burdett, $30, and Pvt. (1st cl.) J. S. Boehn, $50, for loss of shotguns, private property of the claimants, which were stolen from a storeroom of the Quartermaster Detachment where they had been impounded as the result of an order issued by the post commander, Fort McKinley, Philippine Islands. (e) Pittsburgh Steamship Co., Cleveland, Ohio, in the amount of $3,368.61 for damages on account of the collision of its steamer B. F. Affleck with the Government dredge General G. G. Meade, in the St. Marys River near Rains Island on August 29, 1932: Provided. That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in exin the St. Marys Kiver hear Rains Island on August 29, 1932: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary not in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary not-withstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. CHARLES L. REED

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1621) for the relief of Mrs. Charles L. Reed, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$4,000", and to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Charles L. Reed, of Huntington, W. Va., the sum of $4,000 in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for injuries suffered when struck by a United States mail truck at Huntington, W. Va., on October 16, 1929: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FAIRMONT CREAMERY, OMAHA, NEBR.

The bill (S. 1008) for the relief of the Fairmont Creamery, of Omaha, Nebr., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive, consider, and determine, in accordance with law, but without regard to any statute of limitations, any claim filed not later than 6 months after the passage of this act by the Fairmont Creamery Co., Omaha, Nebr., for the refund of Federal income and profits taxes collected from the said Fairmont Creamery Co. for 1918 in excess of the amount properly due: Provided, That in the settlement of said claim there shall be no allowance of interest.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1136) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of the estate of Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N. Y., the sum of $602.92, and the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary not-withstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this said shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 783) for the relief of the International Mercantile Marine Co., which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,400 to the International Mercantile Marine Co., to reimburse said company for penalties which were assessed and collected but not actually incurred under the immigration laws of the United States, and so found by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit on July 7, 1931 (51 Fed. (2d) 1053), the failure of said company to file suit within the statutory period of limitations for the recovery of said sum being hereby waived: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] to explain this measure.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator will observe from the report that the Committee on Claims has favorably reported a bill identical with one which it reported last year, and which passed the Senate at the last session. The purpose of the bill is to reimburse the International Mercantile Marine Co. for penalties which were assessed and collected but not actually incurred under the immigration laws of the United States.

The Senator will see, at the bottom of page 2 of the report, that the Assistant Attorney General says:

I see no objection to this bill on the merits. Whether the 6-year limitation of the Tucker Act should be waived is a question for the determination of Congress.

The bill seems to be meritorious, and I hope it may pass.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, the International Mercantile Marine Co. brought into the United States in violation of law, or in violation of some of the regulations, a number of aliens, and by reason of these alleged and perhaps actual violations upon the part of the company penalties prescribed by law were assessed against the company.

Mr. COPELAND. That is true.

Mr. KING. And the company now seeks to escape the liability which legally attaches to it for its infraction of the law. Is that just?

Mr. COPELAND. The fines were imposed and paid more than 6 years before the commencement of the suit; and then it was found by a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals that there should be a modification so as to exclude the fines that had been imposed and paid 6 years before the suit was brought. It seems to me it is perfectly reasonable that the court should hold that the recovery of such fines was barred when the statute of limitation applied.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this matter is fraught with some complexities. I shall not interpose an objection, but upon examining the report I may move to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPAGNIE GENERALE TRANSATLANTIQUE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 790) for the relief of the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to add a proviso at the end of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, to reimburse said company for penalties which were assessed and collected but not actually incurred under the immigration laws of the United States, and so found by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit on July 7, 1931 (51 Fed. (2d) 1053), the failure of said company to file suit within the statutory period of limitation for the recovery of said sum being hereby waved: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill is similar in character to the one just passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 574) relative to Members of Congress acting as attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, this bill is one with which I am in accord, but I have doubt as to whether it is sufficiently comprehensive in its terms. I suggest that an opportunity be afforded me to confer with the author of the bill; and I request that it go over.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado spoke to me about a possible amendment which he might desire to offer to the bill; and as we have not had time to consider the amendment, I do not object to the bill's going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HAROLD S. SHEPARDSON

The bill (S. 652) for the relief of Harold S. Shepardson, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this man had a total military service of 5 years 11 months and 22 days, covering two enlistment periods. The record shows he served the full 3-year period for the first enlistment, receiving an honorable discharge, reenlisted May 5, 1902, and served all but 8 days of the second 3-year enlistment period. His mother had died during his second enlistment. Hearing that her estate was in danger of immediate dissipation, and, feeling that his presence was immediately required, he left the service just 8 days before the expiration of his second 3-year enlistment. The committee feels that the circumstances justify the action recommended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Harold S. Shepardson, late of Company A, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged April 28, 1905, from the military service of the United States: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

CONVEYANCE OF LANDS TO UNIVERSITY OF OREGON

The bill (S. 978) authorizing the Secretary of War to convey to the University of Oregon, certain lands, forming a part of the Coos Head River and Harbor Reservation, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to convey by quitclaim deed to the University of Oregon, State of Oregon, subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, the following-described part of the Coos Head River and Harbor Reservation situated on the south shore of the entrance to Coos Bay in Coos County, Oreg.: All of lot 3, section 2, township 26 south, range 14 west, Willamette meridian, except the west 750 feet of said lot heretofore conveyed to the University of Oregon: Provided, That such conveyance shall not be made until the Civilian Conservation Corps has relinquished the use and occupancy of said land.

Sec. 2. The lands herein authorized to be conveyed shall be used by the University of Oregon solely for scientific and educational purposes subject, however, to the right of the United States, in case of war or other emergency, to assume control of, hold, use, and occupy said lands or any part thereof for any and all military, naval, or other governmental purposes, and subject at all times to the rights of the United States stated in section 3 hereof. The deed executed by the Secretary of War under the provisions of section 1 of this act shall contain the express condition that if the University of Oregon shall at any time attempt to alienate said lands that same shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 3. The lands herein authorized to be conveyed to the University of Oregon shall at all times be subject to the right of the

SEC. 3. The lands herein authorized to be conveyed to the University of Oregon shall at all times be subject to the right of the United States to occupy and use such part thereof as are now or may hereafter be needed for jetty site or sites, for rights-of-way for tramways to such jetty site or sites, and for ingress and egress by persons engaged in river and harbor work; and the United States shall at all times have prior right to three-fourths of the natural flow of streams draining lots 2 and 3.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 236) for the relief of the heirs of Burton Stearns Adams, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask that that bill go over. I may say that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Logan1 has been compelled, on account of official business, to absent himself from the Chamber for some time, and, at his suggestion, as well as because of my own desire, I also ask that Orders of Business 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, and 224, being, respectively, the bills S. 236, S. 743, S. 279, S. 535, S. 537, S. 998, S. 1472, S. 428, and S. 937 be passed

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator if he will permit me, before he makes the request, to say a word about Order of Business 224, being the bill (S. 937) for the relief of the J. M. Dooley Fireproof Warehouse Corporation, of Brooklyn, N. Y.?

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that we will approach the consideration of the bill again within a day or two, and that the Senator from Kentucky ought to be here when it is considered, I think I shall have to insist on the objection.

Mr. COPELAND. Order of Business 224, being Senate bill 937, may I say to the Senator, was not reported by the Senator from Kentucky but was reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. KING. I understand that; but the Senator from Kentucky has had to do with it in one way or another, as well as with the other bills to which I have referred.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I was interested in Order of Business 219, being Senate bill 535, for the relief of William Cornwell and others.

Mr. KING. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky, I ask that all the bills to which I have referred go over; and I will do it on my own responsibility, for that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills indicated by the Senator from Utah will be passed over.

NATURALIZATION OF RAKHA SINGH GHERWAL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 447) conferring jurisdiction on the United States District Court for the District of Oregon to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the suit in equity of Rakha Singh Gherwal against the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that measure. I invite to it the attention of the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary]. It proposes to confer jurisdiction on the District Court for the District of Oregon in an equity proceeding.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the title of the bill indicates clearly its general purpose. Inasmuch, however, as it has been reported by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], I should prefer that he make explanation.

Mr. HATCH. As I understand the case, judgment was rendered by default by the District Court of Oregon in 1924 canceling a certificate of naturalization. This bill merely confers jurisdiction on the same court to entertain a bill in equity to set aside the previous judgment canceling the certificate of naturalization. It gives the man a day in court and a chance to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed,

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the District of Oregon to hear, determine, and render judgment upon any suit in equity hear, determine, and render judgment upon any suit in equity brought by Rakha Singh Gherwal against the United States for the purpose of setting aside the default decree of such court rendered November 21, 1924, canceling the certificate of naturalization no. 1649806 of such Rakha Singh Gherwal.

SEC. 2. Such suit in equity may be instituted at any time within 6 months after the enactment of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitation. Proceedings for the determination of any such suit shall be had, and appeals from any judgment or decree entered therein shall be taken. In from any judgment or decree entered therein shall be taken, in the same manner as in the case of suits in equity over which such court has jurisdiction under paragraph (1) of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Richard P. Williams to be brigadier general in the Marine Corps.

Mr. KING. Over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand, Mr. President, that some conferences are in progress about the nomination of General Williams and also that of General Russell. I do not wish to delay them; I myself should like to see them disposed of, but, if there is no objection on the part of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary], I suggest that they go over until the conferences shall have been concluded.

Mr. McNARY. Are the conferences now being held?

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand they are.

Mr. McNARY. And it is understood, then, that these nominations will be continued no later than at the next executive session?

Mr. ROBINSON. I would agree to that suggestion, but I am not in the position at this time to say that that can be done.

Mr. McNARY. I am not asking for such an agreement, but am expressing the hope that the nominations will be considered at that time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I concur in the Senator's hope.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations of General Williams and General Russell will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Bunk Gardner to be United States attorney, western district of Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John J. Farrell to be United States marshal, district of Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTER

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Edward H. Goodwin to be postmaster at Plainfield, N. J.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, adjourned until Thursday, February 28, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 26, 1935

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Bunk Gardner to be United States attorney, western district of Kentucky.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

John J. Farrell to be United States marshal, district of Minnesota.

POSTMASTER

NEW JERSEY

Edward H. Goodwin, Plainfield.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, our Heavenly Father, we realize Thy infinite goodness and the assurance of our safety in an ordered world. They testify to the inspiration that saves and to Thy grace and everlasting righteousness. Often joy is touched with pain and disappointment falls upon the brightest hour, yet we rejoice that there is a good God, who wonders not amid the wrecks of a forsaken world. Gracious Lord, bestow Thy blessing upon us and persuade us that happy is the one who, in calmer moods and with wider vision, has abounding faith in the All-Father. Do Thou give zest to the spirit of devotion to our country. Bring us into the realization that only the workers know the sweetness of calm and rest. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE JOHN MORROW

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform the House of the death in Santa Fe yesterday of the Honorable John Morrow, who served three terms in this body from the State of New Mexico, which I now have the honor to represent. A school teacher, a lawyer of note, and a trusted public servant during his useful life, John Morrow was held in high esteem by the people of his State. In his death New Mexico loses a valued and able statesman, and I am sure there are many Members of this House who served with Mr. Morrow who mourn his passing.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order today, Calendar Wednesday, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

JURISDICTION OF COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COM-MERCE AND COMMITTEE ON THE MERCHANT MARINE, RADIO, AND FISHERIES

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have a unanimous-consent request which is on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the request. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 5379, a bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by water carriers operating in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, be rereferred from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries; and further, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that hereafter all bills relating to or affecting transportation by water carriers, regardless of the fact that they may amend an act which was originally considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume this request is made on the assumption that House Resolution 126 is going to be adopted by the House today?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SNELL. It would seem to me the proper procedure would be first to change the jurisdiction of these committees and then present this unanimous-consent request, although I have no objection to the matter coming up now.

Mr. RAYBURN. There was a special reason, I may say to the gentleman, for presenting the unanimous-consent request first.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, do I understand by the request that in the future the matter of water transportation will be considered entirely by one committee and rail transportation by another committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think it is contemplated that the inland rivers are in this resolution. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bland] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach], with whom I conversed about this matter, are here, and I may say that it is my understanding that all matters with respect to foreign commerce and related subjects go to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

Mr. BLAND. Of course, insofar as inland rivers are concerned, there are certain matters that have always been before the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. It occurred to me that we should be a little careful about changing the jurisdiction of committees by unanimous consent when it affected the subject of transportation, which some of us believe must be viewed as a whole and in one picture, in order to get the best results.

If we consent here we will send all water transportation questions to one committee and all rail questions to another committee and all bus and truck transportation questions to another committee; we may be getting away from efficiency.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, this proposition is part and parcel of an agreement, not only between the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but it has been carefully scrutinized and revised by the Committee on Rules, which has jurisdiction over the referring to committees of bills relating to subject matters within the jurisdiction of such committees. This unanimous-consent request is to be immediately followed by the presentation of a rule coming from the Rules Committee which further deals with the subject matter of jurisdiction. It does not in any way bring about a conflict of jurisdiction. Insofar as cooperation and coordination with respect to rates of competing water, highway, and railroad carriers are concerned, that is with the Interstate Commerce Committee, but all shipping matters concerning vessels on the rivers and on the coast and in overseas transportation have always belonged to the Merchant Marine Committee, and with the acquiescence of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and with the sanction of the Rules Committee, this plan has been worked out and is satisfactory to all those who have made a study of the subject, and they agree with this particular solution of the question.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, then, the Rules Committee is going to bring in a rule so that some consideration may be given to the matter?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. Mr. MICHENER. And this unanimous-consent request is not going to settle the matter for all time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no.
Mr. O'CONNOR. The Rules Committee proposes immediately to call up a resolution which fixes the jurisdiction of the two respective committees.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, that should have been done first, should it not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. We did not think so.

Mr. SNELL. I think so, but I am not going to object to the request.

I would like to ask one more question of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach]. As I understand it, the control of the boats on the rivers, and so forth, will be under the Merchant Marine Committee, but the rates under the jurisdiction of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is substantially correct. That is the way it is now.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that: but is it to continue the

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In defining the subject matter to be presented to these various committees, does the gentleman think it is distinct and definite enough so there will be no further argument between the two committees?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not think there is any possibility of any further controversy.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, we could not hear on this side clearly the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries; and I think, because of his position and interest in the matter, the RECORD ought to show pretty definitely his understanding of this request. Is it the gentleman's understanding that as far as the jurisdiction of the two committees over inland waterway transportation is concerned this request and the rule to be adopted later does not change that jurisdiction at all from what it is now?

Mr. BLAND. Jurisdiction over inland waters remains as at present.

Mr. MAPES. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee if the regulation of rates will still be under the jurisdiction of his committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, on which I happen to serve, if this resolution or proposition proposes that all maritime matters go to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries? Is that the understanding?

Mr. BLAND. Not as to inland waters.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The fact is at the present time inland navigation with respect to its physical aspect is now with the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. Insofar as the rate structure is concerned relative to the various means of transportation in interstate commerce, particularly where it competes with railroads, that remains with the Interstate Commerce Committee, and there is no conflict at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. CONNERY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I hope it is an augury that in the near future all labor matters will be referred to the Committee on Labor. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REFERENCE OF BILLS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the rereference of the bills H. R. 5453 and H. R. 2845 from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to the Committee on Civil Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, what are these

Mr. MEAD. H. R. 5453, to extend the classified civil service to postmasterships of the first, second, and third classes, and for other purposes, and H. R. 2845, to provide for appointments to the Post Office Department and the Postal Service solely on the basis of efficiency and merit, to extend the civil-service system, and for other purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Will they be referred to the Democratic national chairman? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Could not the gentleman make those retroactive for 3 years? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from Ernest N. Haston, secretary of state of the State of Tennessee, enclosing a copy of House Joint Resolution 15, adopted by the General Assembly of Tennessee February 20, 1935, memorializing the Congress to enact laws that will pay the balance due the World War veterans on their adjusted-compensation certificates. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the resolution referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, February 20, 1935:

STATE OF TENNESSEE,

To all whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Ernest N. Haston, secretary of state of the State of Tennessee, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true copy of house joint resolution no. 15, acts of 1935, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my official signature and, by order of the Governor, affixed the great seal of the State of Tennessee at the department in the city of Nashville this 23d day of February, A. D. 1935.

[SEAL]

ERNEST N. HASTON, Secretary of State.

House Joint Resolution 15

(By O. L. Carter)

Memorial asking Congress to pass laws that will pay the soldiers' bonus, etc.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Tennessee (the senate concurring), That—
Whereas due to the long-continued depression, thousands of American veterans of the World War are unemployed and without the means of adequate support and are unable to provide the necessities and comforts of life for themselves and their families through no fault of their own; and necessities and comforts of life for themselves and their families through no fault of their own; and

Whereas it is the policy of the national administration in its recovery program to bring about a distribution of public funds and accomplish wide-spread reemployment; and

Whereas the payment of the remainder of the amount due on the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates held by veterans of the World War will result in a distribution of money to every community in the United States, which money will find its way into every channel of trade through the purchase of necessities and comforts of life, the payments of debts, the building and repairing of homes, the rehabilitation of small business enterprises, and through many other needed expenditures; and

Whereas the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars have, in their respective national conventions, overwhelmingly approved the immediate cash payment of said certificates; and Whereas such certificates constitute a just obligation of the Government to the veterans of the World War: Now, therefore, be it be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Tennessee (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States immediately pass such legislation as is necessary for the immediate payment of the balance due on such adjusted-compensation certificates, with the remittance of interest and other charges against the principal sum of such certificates; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of Tennessee be directed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Joe BYRNS, and also that a copy of the same be forwarded to Senators N. L. BACHMAN and K. D. McKellar, and to each of the nine Members of the United States House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee.

Adopted February 20, 1935.

Walter M. Haynes, Speaker of the House of Representatives. W. P. Moss, Speaker of the Senate.

Approved February 21, 1935.

HILL MCALISTER, Governor,

PERMISSION OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor be given permission to sit during the sessions of the House for the next 3 days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ODD FELLOWSHIP AND GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address by my colleague [Mr. CARTWRIGHT].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an address delivered by Congressman Wilburn Cartwright, of Oklahoma, at the Boosters' Society banquet held at New York City on Feb-

It was my pleasure to be present at the Boosters' meeting and listen to the eloquent talk delivered by Congressman CARTWRIGHT. It was particularly appropriate that he should speak on this occasion. He is grand master of the Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F., of Oklahoma, and represented that jurisdiction at the Booster's Society banquet.

The address Mr. Cartwright delivered is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Grand Sire PITTENGER, officers and boosters, my to bed and close up the chicken coops, see that the cows have been milked, and the horses fed.

been milked, and the horses fed.

I have been sitting here tonight, noting the similarity between New York City and the State of Oklahoma.

New York City and the State of Oklahoma.

New York City is the great cosmopolitan metropolis of the world. It is made up of people from every nation on the earth. Oklahoma is also cosmopolitan. It is made up of the cream of the citizenship of every State in the Union. We also have over 100,000 Indians, practically all of whom are educated and capable of taking care of themselves in any man's country.

New York City is noted for its wealthy men like Rockefeller and Morgan. Oklahoma is noted for its outstanding characters like Will Rogers and Bill Murray.

New York City is powerful with many great skyscrapers. Ok-

New York City is powerful with many great skyscrapers. Oklahoma is powerful, too. We do not have such high skyscrapers or a big water front like you folks; but if all the hogs of Oklahoma were one hog he could stand with his hind feet in Albany and front feet in Manhattan and with one root, root up Wall Street and cast it into the Atlantic Ocean.

If all the chickens of Oklahoma were one chicken, he could stand upon the tallest of your skyscrapers and with one crow jar the torch off the Statue of Liberty.

jar the torch off the Statue of Liberty.

If all the grain raised in Oklahoma were dumped on to the city of New York, you could stand upon the top of it and tickle the feet of the angels in Heaven.

If all the oil wells in Oklahoma were one oil well it would reach from New York City to Hades.

A New York boy and an Oklahoma City boy were quarreling over the merits of their respective cities. "Aw, wha'cha talkin' about?" said the boy from New York. "All de wise guys lives in de East. Don't it say in de Bible dat de wise men came out of de East?" "Sure, it says de wise men come out of de East, agreed the boy from Oklahoma City. "Dey come out of de East just as quick as dey get wise." You people talk about the "wild and wooly West." As a matter of fact, Oklahoma is largely made up of easterners gone west.

wooly West." As a matter of fact, Okianoma is largely made up of easterners gone west.

Seriously, I consider it a great distinction and honor to be invited here in company with Grand Sire William A. Pittenger, to speak to the Booster Society of New York. I have enjoyed the welcome, the fraternal greeting, the glad hand, the pleasant smiles, the ready sympathy, and the hearty fellowship of your great city since arriving here this afternoon. I bring you greetings from about 30,000 Oklahoma Odd Fellows and Rebekahs—the finest people the sun ever shone upon. The brotherhood of man rises above ple the sun ever shone upon. The brotherhood of man rises above all of our strife in life, and it is a beautiful thing that men can get together once in a while and be men socially for the brotherhood of man.

I find that Odd Fellows are all pretty much the same kind of good folks from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. And among the sweetest and most wholesome experiences of life are the meetings of friends who esteem each other, who have real affection for each other, who have much in common, and yet who have rare opportunities to meet and fraternize in a congenial atmosphere as on this occasion.

We are proud to see our order make progress, not only in numbers, but to improve in its personnel and its ability to command the respect of all good citizens.

We strive to have our lodge meetings conducted in such a manner as to be a lesson in good deportment, cultivating a proper respect for its offices, and creating a respect for our lodge akin to that which all should have for the church and for law and order.

All good citizens are proud of the accomplishments made in inventions, literature, science, art, and all those things that have so added to the comfort, convenience, and enlightenment of the human race. In their early stages, probably all the inventions such as the printing press, steam engine, railroads, cotton gin, telegraph, automobile, airplane, radio, etc., were crude affairs, which have been brought to the present-day perfection by painstaking care and development.

Such is the history of our order, created in the brains of the few who felt that they had something in common with their fellow men and also something that would in time be recognized by the world at large as beneficial to the human race, and who, at best, could have had but a vague conception of the future great-st, could have had but a vague conception of the future ness of the order which they were instrumental in originating.

How well this idea of theirs has developed through their efforts and through the efforts of all those who followed them should be a matter of pride to all our members.

matter of pride to all our members.

Go into a piano house, strike a certain key, and every string on the same pitch in every instrument will catch it up and repeat it. That is sympathy. That is brotherhood. It means that if one portion of the human body suffers, the whole family suffers. It means that if a wrong is done to the workingman, an injury is inflicted on the whole social body. Brotherhood means a common sympathy between all parts of society and that each shall interest itself in the welfare of the other. And brotherhood means that I shall not only have an interest in the mass but especially in the shall not only have an interest in the mass but especially in the man. It is personal and individual. I must help him; I must give him a hand if he is down. If he has fallen, I must not only rescue him if I can, but I must do all in my power to remove the cause of his downfall.

A certain college professor at a meeting asked this question, "If a billy goat should eat a rabbit, what would happen?" They were hall from the wide-open country where we gather, for such meetings as this, early so we can get home in time to put the children the butter." Now, at the risk of being considered a "hair" in the butter, I will indulge in a little discourse right here on the relation of fraternalism and American statesmanship.

In our country and in our times no man is worthy the honored

In our country and in our times no man is worthy the honored name of statesman who does not include the highest practical education of the people in all his plans of administration. He may have eloquence, he may have a knowledge of all history, diplomacy, jurisprudence, and by these he might claim in other countries the elevated rank of a statesman; but unless he speaks, plans, labors, at all times and in all places, for the culture and edification of the whole people he is not—he cannot be—an American statesman.

Comte said, "Ideas govern the world or throw it into confusion." The Czar's idea of his divine right to govern the world threw it into disorder. The ideas of peace and humanity within the masterful mind and heart of President Roosevelt, one of the big brothers of Odd Fellowship, brought order out of confusion and he is now leading the world in the truth and sentiment of brotherhood. It is with the greatest of pride that we point to President Roosevelt as a member in good standing of the little Odd Fellow lodge at Hyde Park, N. Y.

Let us also remember that our first President, George Washington, was a fraternalist; that he recognized the value of fraternal connections; that he accepted leadership with fidelity of purpose. There is none of us so fine, so big, so great, that we cannot benefit by an emulation of the fraternal activities of George Washington.

Tomorrow is Washington's birthday, and since he took the oath office as the first President of the United States in this, the first Capitol, it is well that we turn back for a moment to his life and office as the first President of the United States in this, the Irst Capitol, it is well that we turn back for a moment to his life and day.

You have all heard of "George Washington's little hatchet." The other day I heard a story that was a little variation upon the original, and I am going to take up your time for a minute by repeating it to you. It was to this effect: Mr. Washington and Mrs. Washington, the parents of George, found on one occasion that their supply of soap for the use of the family at Westmoreland had been exhausted; and so they decided to make some family soap. They made the necessary arrangements and gave the requisite instructions to the family servant. After an hour or so the servant returned and reported to them that he could not make the soap. "Why not", he was asked; "haven't you all the material?" "Yes", he replied, "but there is something wrong." The old folks proceeded to investigate, and they found they had actually gotten the ashes of the little cherry tree that George had cut down with his hatchet, and there was no lye in it.

Now, I assure you, there is no lie in what I say to you when I assert that George Washington stands among the greatest men of human history, and those in the same rank with him are very few. Whether we measure by what he did, or what he was, or by the effect of his work on the history of mankind, in every respect he is entitled to the place he holds among the greatest of his race. As no one can add to the glory of the immortal Washington. First in war first in peace, and first in the hearts of his country-race. As no one can add to the brightness of the hoon-day sun, so no words can add to the glory of the immortal Washington. First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, his fame will shine with undiminished splendor through all the coming ages. Under the smiles of the beneficent heavens he was the creator and savior of the greatest Nation in the history of the world. Oh, if there had not been such an instrument as this in the day that tried men's souls!

When bowed by the burden of years, he laid aside the robes of office and like the humblest citizen of the young Republic wended his way to his beloved Mount Vernon soon to sink into the tomb, amid the grief of his countrymen and the reverend admiration of the civilized world.

Let us record the words as they fell from the peerless leader of our Army in the Revolution, our first and foremost President and unequaled statesman. Let us ponder upon the closing sentences of his farewell.

"In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I course which has hitherto marked the destiny of hatlons, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

"Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after 45 years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest. be to the mansions of rest.

"Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers."

Few men of all time have such a record of achievement as our first and beloved President, George Washington. Still fewer can show, at the end of a career so crowded with high deeds and memorable victories, a life so free from spot, a character so un-selfish and so pure, a fame so void of doubtful points demanding either defense or explanation. Eulogy of such a life is needless, but it is always important to recall and to freshly remember just what manner of man he was.

Friends, we are all engaged in worth-while achievements. Our organization has definite purposes and ideals. We have visions of accomplishments; and vision with brotherly love has ever been the guiding angel of mankind. Throughout history it has always been the man of vision who has led. No progress has ever been made without it, and a Nation's greatest assets are its men of made without it, and a Nation's greatest assets are its men of vision, whether statesmen, educators, inventors, or industrialists. I am proud to say here tonight that our outstanding American men of vision have been and are imbued with an abundance of the spirit of brotherly love, the very essence of fraternalism.

If this age can be said to be conscious of a definite aim and having a predominate purpose, it is that of bettering the conditions of life and infusing a spirit of humanity among all men. The world is looking at its questions from a new viewpoint, namely, that of humanity. Those who are living in the spirit of the age are not asking, "Am I my brother's keeper?" nor "Who is my neighbor?", but they are assuming the responsibilities of brotherhood and in sympathy, good will, and practical benevolence are helping to bear the burdens which are so crushing to the less fortunate brother. fortunate brother.

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which I have the honor

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which I have the honor to represent as grand master in the jurisdiction of Oklahoma, having rounded out 115 years of honorable achievement in America, is still forging forward with unabated vigor. Unquestionably, it is an important pillar in the temple of civilization and the moral influence of its worthy principles is felt the world around.

Judging by all appearances, you people of New York have merged yourselves into this great order, and I congratulate you on this moving and active booster society. Undoubtedly you have set high goals for yourselves and have attained them.

In Oklahoma our motto is "Go and do" and our watchword is "progress." We are striving to attain higher goals through organization, cooperation, teamwork, and push. We are proud of the progress we have made and of the fine citizenship in our order. We expect the near future to find us double in size, double in strength, and more perfect in quality.

And now as I close I want to give you the little poem by Kipling that I have quoted many times throughout the jurisdiction of Oklahoma:

It ain't the guns nor armaments, nor the funds that they can pay, But the close cooperation that makes them win the day. It ain't the individual nor the army as a whole, But the everlasting teamwork of every bloomin' soul."

AMENDATORY REGULATIONS ON MIGRATORY GAME BIRDS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of a proclamation amending the regulations of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act, and the regulations issued under that treaty. We are having a number of requests for copies of this. It is not available. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture, by virtue of the authority Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture, by virtue of the authority vested in him by section 3 of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act (40 Stat. 755; U. S. C., title 16, secs. 703-711), has submitted to me for approval a regulation further amendatory of the regulations approved and proclaimed July 31, 1918, which the Secretary of Agriculture has determined to be a suitable amendatory regulation permitting and governing the hunting, taking, capture, killing, possession, sale, purchase, shipment, transportation, carriage, and export of migratory birds and parts thereof and their nests and eggs. as follows: eggs, as follows:

eggs, as follows:

Regulation 3, "Means by which migratory game birds may be taken", as set forth in Proclamation No. 2094, of August 20, 1934, is amended by inserting in the third line of the first paragraph thereof, between the word "hereof" and the semicolon, a comma and the words "but they shall not be taken with or by means of any automatic-loading or hand-operated repeating shotgun capable of holding more than three shells the magazine of which has not been cut off or plugged with a one-piece metal or wooden filler. not been cut off or plugged with a one-piece metal or wooden filler incapable of removal through the loading end thereof, so as to reduce the capacity of said gun to not more than three shells at one loading", so that the paragraph as amended will read as fol-

"The migratory game birds specified in regulation 4 hereof may be taken during the open season with a gun only, not larger than no. 10 gage, fired from the shoulder, except as specifically permitted by regulations 7, 8, 9, and 10 hereof, but they shall not be taken with or by means of any automatic-loading or hand-operated repeating shotgun capable of holding more than three shells the magazine of which has not been cut off, or plugged with a one-piece metal or wooden filler incapable of removal through the loading end thereof, so as to reduce the capacity of said gun to not more than three shells at one loading; they may be taken during the open season from the land and water, with the aid of a dog, the use of decoys, and from a blind or floating device, except that in the taking of wild ducks not more than 25 live duck decoys may be chet every early in the taking of wild guns of wild guess in California. shot over, and in the taking of wild geese in California the use of live goose decoys is not permitted; but nothing herein shall be deemed to permit the use of an automobile, airplane, power boat, deemed to permit the use of an automobile, airplane, power boat, sallboat, any boat under sall, any floating device towed by power boat or sailboat, or any sinkbox (battery), except that sinkboxes (batteries) may be used in the taking of migratory waterfowl in coastal sounds and bays (including Back Bay, Princess Anne County, State of Virginia) and other coastal waters; and nothing herein shall be deemed to permit the use of an airplane, or a power boat, sailboat, or other floating device for the purpose of concentrating, driving, rallying, or stirring up migratory waterfowl; and mourning doves shall not be shot or otherwise taken by means of bait." bait.

And whereas upon consideration it appears that approval of the foregoing amendatory regulation will effectuate the purposes of the aforesaid Migratory Bird Treaty Act and result in reducing the annual kill of migratory game birds.

Now, therefore, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, do hereby approve and proclaim the foregoing mendatory regulation.

JURISDICTION OF COMMITTEES ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE AND MERCHANT MARINE, RADIO, AND FISHERIES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 126, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 126

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives are amended in the following manner: "Rule X, clause 9. On the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to consist of 21 Members.

"Rule XI, clause 7. To commerce—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

"Rule XI, clause 9. To the merchant marine, including all transportation by water, Coast Guard, life-saving service, light-houses, lightships, ocean derelicts, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Panama Canal, and fisheries—to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

This matter of the jurisdictional dispute of two great committees of the House, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, has given the Rules Committee real concern. For some time there has been this dispute in the House as to the jurisdiction of those two committees. Early in this session the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bland], the Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, introduced House Resolution 40, to change the jurisdiction of the committee of which he is chairman, which would have affected the jurisdiction of matters which have been before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Rules Committee has had several hearings on the matter. Modified and amended resolutions have been introduced, so that finally to the House we now present House Resolution 126, fixing the jurisdiction of these two committees, and changing the name of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. That resolution has been reported by the Committee on Rules and also represents an agreement in complete accord between the two committees. Both committees have agreed entirely to the resolution and the question of their respective jurisdiction.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, today, a few minutes ago, made a unanimous-consent request which was granted and which I shall more fully explain as I interpret it. This unanimous-consent request covers two points. The first part of the request refers to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries as it was, a bill, H. R. 5379, which was recently introduced by Mr. RAYBURN, pertaining to "the regulation of transportation of passengers and property by water carriers operating in interstate and foreign commerce", and which bill the Speaker referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Merchant Marine Committee has always claimed jurisdiction of that subject matter. The second part of the unanimous-consent request was intended to meet a situation which has grown up by precedent in this The Speaker has been compelled by the precedents House. to refer to a committee a proposed amendment of any law which had previously been reported out by that committee. For instance, last year an omnibus bill came before the House placing in the Communications Commission, a new bureau or commission of government, jurisdiction over all communications, telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio. That bill was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Radio some years ago was placed under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and the name of that committee was changed to include the word "radio." When a bill is introduced, for instance, amending the communications law, under the precedents, the Speaker, following them, must refer the proposed amendment to the committee which reported the bill originally.

The second part of Mr. RAYBURN'S unanimous-consent request covers that situation as far as bills relating to transportation by water carriers are concerned. It in effect overrides those precedents as far as bills relating to the merchant marine are concerned.

This jurisdictional dispute has been a troublesome subject. The Rules Committee has given a great deal of consideration to it. Both standing committees concerned, by their members individually and through and by action of the full committees have had almost daily conferences, and have finally worked out this resolution, to which everyone has agreed.

I am informed that in the Washington Post this morning an article appears stating that this resolution is a victory for one side. That is as far from the truth as anything could be. This is a victory for neither side. No one wins here. The fact that the Merchant Marine Committee has jurisdiction over radio does not justify any statement that the other committee wins the dispute. The Rules Committee came to the determination that you could not properly divide communications, and that radio, telegraph, telephone, and cable inevitably went together, and, the Interstate Commerce Committee having jurisdiction of most of those subjects and for a longer time than the Merchant Marine Committee had jurisdiction over radio, it was thought best and fairest to put radio in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. On the other hand the Merchant Marine Committee reestablishes and reclaims its jurisdiction over the merchant marine and over many matters which were under the jurisdiction of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. There is no victory, therefore, for either side, and the Rules Committee would not be a party to any such a result. We have in fact taken from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee many matters over which it has had jurisdiction, and there is no mathematician who could interpret the resolution to the effect that it is a victory for either side, the article in the Washington Post to the contrary notwith-

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wish to confirm what the gentleman has just said. This was a unanimous agreement between the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Everybody concerned is happy to have worked out this solution of a difficult problem, to relieve this dispute between the two committees, and to relieve the Speaker of the quandary in which he finds himself when omnibus bills and others bills come before him for reference. I believe the House should sustain the action of these two taken in bringing this resolution before the House.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate something about the argument that has gone on between these two committees for a great many years. I think it is good to have this matter settled and I am glad it has been amicably settled. But, as I stated sometime ago, it seems to me the logical procedure should have been to change the jurisdiction of the committees first and then, after that, rerefer the bills. In other words, we should not put the cart before the horse. If the gentleman does not care to discuss that matter, it is all right with me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it, and perhaps I do not understand it, this bill which the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce asked to be rereferred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries pertained to the merchant marine. If there was any objection to that rereference, it would still remain in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the resolution here pertaining to these matters would not take care of that bill. The bill would not reach the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SNELL. That is true, but the proper time to have asked that was after the jurisdiction of the committee had

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is a difference of opinion on that. However, I do not think there is anything sinister in making the request first.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask one further question? I do not quite understand the amendment, which reads "rule X, clause 9, on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to consist of 21

Mr. O'CONNOR. That simply changes the name of the committee by omitting the word "Radio." We took out the word "Radio."

Mr. SNELL. It simply changes the name?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is all.
Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman said that for logical reasons radio is being placed with other communications?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For "practical" reasons.

Mr. MICHENER. And I add "logical reasons." Therefore is it not just as reasonable that the matter of transportation should be placed in the hands of one group? In other words, with one group determining how safety devices and operation expenses to be incurred shall be determined, should not the same group which controls the revenues or the rates determine that matter?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That might have been the first impression of the Rules Committee, but after thoroughly considering the subject we thought that water transportation might be continued within the jurisdiction of this old Committee on Merchant Marine, which has had to do with it for many years. As to that subject, however, I am not qualified to go into it thoroughly with the gentleman, but when the members of these two committees discuss the resolution they will be able to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MICHENER. Has not the Rules Committee yielded to the question of consent? In other words, you have two committees warring over jurisdiction and not giving consideration to the merits of the legislation, but to the jurisdiction of Mr. O'CONNOR. As I interpret it, the Rules Committee has not yielded one iota. The Rules Committee believes this is the way to solve the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Transportation on land within the United States and its competition by river boats and canal boats is an entirely different subject from merchant marine. which competes with foreign countries and which has always been within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. Now, having jurisdiction over the most important part of water transportation.

great committees and the position the Rules Committee has | it had, as a growth, received jurisdiction over all boats that carried passengers and freight. Whether they were in the transoceanic merchant marine or along the coast or on the river, that has always been in the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, but where transportation by water comes in touch with land transportation and it is a question of coordination of rates and services, and the elimination of ruinous competition, that has been dealt with by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is no conflict between that jurisdiction-

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, the gentleman is using my time and he has 30 minutes of his own to be used later.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Well, the gentleman can have our time. Mr. O'CONNOR. I shall be glad to take it, if necessary. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, further amplifying the question which I just asked, it seems to me the question of transportation has become so important in this country that it should be considered by one agency in this body. Trucks are putting the railroads out of business. Waterways are putting the railroads out of business. It seems to me the height of folly that we should have one committee in this body considering the railroads, another committee considering the waterways, and another committee considering parts of the truck and bus business.

I come from the Great Lakes region. We know what water transportation means when compared with rail transportation. It seems to me that this Congress should adopt the same policy, as far as its committees are concerned, that the Nation has adopted with reference to transportation. There was a fight here extending over a period of years to get into the hands of one body—the Interstate Commerce Commission—the right to control rates and also the right to control the things that make the rates possible. So it is today. If we have the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, for instance, telling the water transportation people what they must use in the way of safety devices, regulating transportation by water, and the Interstate Commerce Commission doing the same thing with railroads, trucks, and busses, then possibly some other committee determining the rates, we are not going to get anywhere.

I have been on the Rules Committee: I know what they are up against; I know it is a real job; I know the jealousies of the committees here. I know every committee, like every bureau in the Government, when it gets jurisdiction, does not want to let go. It is desirable to work out something by unanimous consent. It seems to me, however, that there is a greater question and a larger problem involved than just a unanimous-consent agreement which might for the time being mollify the feelings of these two great committees. The House is not at all interested in whether the one committee wins in the contest for jurisdiction or whether the other committee wins in the contest for jurisdiction.

It may be practical for the purposes of the committees to make agreeable division of this legislation. I submit, however, that it is not practical or logical to send legislation, all of which pertains to a given subject, to several different committees. It has been conceded here by my friend the gentlemen from New Jersey, Mr. Lehlbach, who is the ranking member on the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, that it may be logical to do as I suggest but not practical. At the same time, he admits that it is logical to concentrate telephone, telegraph, radio, and other forms of communication in one committee because each of these agencies performs a service which is similar, so far as result is concerned. It is, therefore, just as logical that one and the same committee should have jurisdiction over legislation affecting transportation. It matters not whether freight is shipped by water, rail, or air, regulations must be made by the Government and rates must be fixed or controlled. It seems to me an anomaly that one committee should have control over transportation by air, another over transportation by rail and trucks, and another over transportation by water. In this connection we might also add pipe lines because it is a well-known fact that the pipe lines are today transporting oil and gas to the direct detriment of other methods of transportation.

Progress requires that each of these methods be encouraged, developed and permitted to exist, and I am convinced that with the control of the proposed legislation divided among several committees, confusion will result. It is nonsensical that one committee should determine the best method of regulation of one method of transportation, thus limiting the revenues of the agency, while another committee regulates the rates which that agency must charge. We may all talk about retaining the railroads. At the same time, anyone familiar with the facts knows that there must be a coordinization or similar regulation of these several transportation facilities. The busses and trucks cannot continue to use the highways, maintained at public expense, without regulation, while the railroads are regulated to death. Modern conditions make the truck inevitable and no one wants to eliminate the truck. At the same time, the railroad is a necessity. Inland waterway transportation is fine but in a great part of the country this form of transportation is only available for 5 or 6 months in the year. Therefore, the railroad cannot be done away with. There is apparently much fear among the Members lest legislation be enacted placing the control of transportation in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission or some body which might, perchance, be railroad minded. I, for one, want to say now that greater consideration must be given to the railroads to the end that freight rates may be reduced and volume increased. It is ridiculous to talk about reducing freight rates and at the same time reduce the volume of business done by the railroads.

I am not going to oppose this rule because possibly it is the best "out" under present conditions, but I am suggesting that the Rules Committee give serious thought to rearrangement of committee jurisdiction so that kindred legislation may be considered along the lines above indicated.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan is criticizing a situation which exists at the present time and which it is not sought to disturb. Jurisdiction over water transportation has always been separated by the Congress from jurisdiction over land transportation. The situation the gentleman would like to see is a unification of control of legislation on transportation. This would, indeed, be an innovation, and this is not the time to seek to bring it about.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. If it is a proper innovation, why is not this the time to bring it about?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because it requires infinitely more study and enlightenment than can be given in a 5-minute speech on the floor of the House.

We are leaving the subject of unification of transportation, both as to administration and legislation, to the future. In this respect we are leaving things as they are today. As I say, I think this is neither the time nor the place to bring up the broader aspects of the matter for consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am for this resolution. It is an amicable settlement between these two committees, fully considered and fully concurred in. It is to be regretted, of course, and it is regretted, that the technical experience of the old Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee passes into the discard, but Congress is used to that, for its experience has been discarded in practically every phase of the legislation we have seen go through this House during the past 2 years.

I rise particularly to say, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution does not settle the question of the coordination of rail and water transportation. There is a movement on foot, backed by propaganda throughout the entire country, to tie up low-rate water transportation with the railroads. Such procedure will destroy the farmers and other groups who are now using the waterways.

I have no sympathy with this movement; and I say that the agreement evidenced today in this resolution does not settle this question. This question must be fought out on its merits when the time comes. If water transportation is to be weighted down with the past sins of the railroads, then, indeed, a new burden, an added, terrible, economic burden, will be placed upon the farmers, the manufacturers, and the shippers who use the inland and ocean waterways.

I am for the resolution and for the rule, but when this question of merging rail and water transportation does arise I warn the gentlemen who are concerned with the transportation rates of the Nation, that this situation will be watched and fought bitterly so that the farmer, the manufacturers, and the other groups engaged in shipping bulk commodities shall not be destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, it has been said here this afternoon that the transfer of rates on inland waterways under this resolution, or the inclusion of transportation by water to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, is not going to prove the solution of the problem of protecting the railroads of the country and the bus lines of the country against the low rates that are now being charged by the Inland Waterways Corporation.

Inland Waterways Corporation is a corporation formed by the Federal Government with a capital of $24,000,000, operated under the direction of Major General Ashburn, who claims that the Federal Inland Waterways Corporation is a profit-making concern and that it is paying the Federal Government to operate it. Major General Ashburn, however, does not figure in the operation of the inland waterways the cost of maintaining his right-of-way on the rivers, nor does he figure interest on the money invested by the Federal Government in this enterprise. The Inland Waterways Corporation also franks its mail; the Government furnishes free of charge its offices here in Washington; the salaries of Major General Ashburn and other Government officials engaged in its operation are paid by the Government. I contend this corporation loses to our Government over $1,000,000 a year.

To permit the Inland Waterways Corporation and others to operate on the Government-maintained rivers, locks, and so forth, in competition with railroads to go without regulation of their rates is merely to take money from the railroads and bus lines and bring them nearer to bankruptcy. We must remember in this connection that the railroads pay into the Federal Treasury nearly $1,000,000 a day in taxes. They employ thousands of people to run them. They buy steel, this helps the steel mills to employ labor; they help this country in thousands of ways; and are we not going to regulate the water transportation the same as we do the railroads? It is not fair if we do not.

It is going to be very indefinite as to how long the railroads are going to be able to continue operating. It is going to be indefinite as to where we are going to get the money for taxation purposes if we continually set the Government up in business. It destroys initiative and kills legitimate business enterprises. It is high time that somebody in the Federal Government take action now and not at some future date to regulate all forms of transportation. If we are going to allow the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to take over this matter and allow it to continue as it has in the past, then we are getting to the point where we will deprive ourselves of taxes to run the Government, and by setting the Government up in business in competition with private enterprise we will kill the goose that lays the golden egg for the operation of our Government.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The rates of the Inland Waterways Corporation are now under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, just as the railroads are, and remains there if we adopt this resolution. Mr. RICH. I hope that is the case, and I hope the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will give some consideration to regulation of all rates, whether it be by water, by rail, or on the highways of this country.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman know that it costs more in some parts of the west to transport a bushel of wheat 100 miles than the wheat itself is worth, and that the only salvation for those regions is water transportation?

Mr. RICH. The Inland Waterways Corporation reduced the rates 7 cents per bushel on wheat from St. Louis to New Orleans in order that they might help the western farmers. The next day the wheat price dropped in Liverpool, the wheat market of the world, 7 cents per bushel, and the Inland Waterways Corporation gave up their revenue. The farmers received no more for their wheat, and the foreign countries getting the benefit; our Government, which you and I help to support, paid the bill. It is time to help Americans, not foreigners.

Mr. CULKIN. The only salvation for the people in those areas is water transportation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few observations about this rule. This is the first time I have seen it, and I suppose it is all right, coming from the great Rules Committee after mature deliberation. However, it turns the Panama Canal over to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I am inclined to believe that the Panama Canal ought to be, by right, under the Committee on Military Affairs. It is governed by the Army, it is run by the Army, and the Canal and its fortifications are our main interest in the Canal Zone. It occurred to me, as I read this resolution, that it would be better to put it under the Committee on Military Affairs. That is not the reason, however, that I rose to speak on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is no more able or harder-working committee in the House, and there is no abler or better informed Member of Congress than is its chairman, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. RAYBURN. [Applause.] That committee in the past, as we all know, has been overburdened with work. I may have incurred the enmity of some members of that committee in my first years of service in this House because at that time they handled veterans' relief legislation. I may say that I fought through a whole session with the chairman, a Republican Member at that time, to get action on a bill to provide pay for an attendant for blind veterans. I could not even get consideration of my bill for a whole year because of more important legislation pending before that committee, such as railroad, coal, and interstate-commerce measures.

It did not have time to consider veteran-relief legislation, with the result that after fighting for a year, some of us got together and helped to create a Veterans' Relief Committee, which took away the power over veteran legislation from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Although at that time the members of that committee were a little bit bitter, I believe now they are glad they got rid of their responsibilities to formulate veterans' legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the main observation I should like to make is: I do not see why the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee should be assigned the control of the Nicaragua Canal bill. Such a bill was introduced recently and was, I believe, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It seems to me that bill should have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I can readily understand why legislation affecting the Panama Canal was sent to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, because that committee handled the original bill, and the Panama Canal is under American control. I can understand the St. Lawrence bill being sent to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, because half of it is under American control. I cannot understand or see any precedent, however, for sending the proposed Nicaragua Canal bill, which involves the building of a canal in a foreign country, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If I had been on the floor at the time I would have joined with the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in insisting that it had been erroneously referred. That is why I rose today, because the matter is before us and we are discussing the powers of the various committees.

Mr. Speaker, without having studied this rule, I take it for granted it has been carefully formulated and is backed by sound consideration. I want to point out, however, to the Rules Committee and to the Members of the House, in considering this proposed rule that in the future I hope that legislation such as measures dealing entirely with foreign affairs, involving, for instance, the Nicaragua Canal, will be sent where they probably belong, namely, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. We do not want anything that belongs to another committee, but insist that matters dealing with international affairs be referred to our committee.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Connery].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I have no criticism whatsoever of the Speaker of this House or of any committee of this House, but this appears to be a good opportunity to give expression to some views which I have held for a long time in reference to committees. I am in favor of this resolution, of course.

I should like to see the Rules Committee consider the entire question of jurisdiction of committees. I do not blame the Speaker of the House or the Ways and Means Committee of the House, when an omnibus bill comes into the House in reference to unemployment insurance and old-age pensions with a tax provision in it, for having it sent to the Ways and Means Committee. This has been the custom and is in accordance with precedent.

Nevertheless, I think the Membership of this House will agree that such legislation going to the Ways and Means Committee merely because of the fact there is a tax provision in it is inequitable and unjust, for the reason that the Committee on Labor, of which I have the honor to be chairman, for the past 15 or 20 years has through extensive hearings, taking up many days and weeks, gone into the matter of old-age security, old-age pensions, and unemployment insurance. What I stated a few minutes ago I mean. I think every matter directly connected with labor or the working people of the United States should be referred to the Committee on Labor. Under the present rules the Speaker cannot do this if there is a tax provision in an omnibus bill.

I sincerely hope the Rules Committee will go into this entire matter at length and look over the jurisdiction of committees and see if some amendments cannot be made to the rules so that we will give labor legislation to the Labor Committee, interstate commerce legislation to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and so on.

There is one further thing I should like to say in closing. Four hundred and thirty-five Members come to this House. The man who is here for his first day is just as intelligent and interested in the welfare of the Nation as the man who has been here for 20 years. He may not have had the opportunity of learning the rules and the regulations and the parliamentary procedure and may have to study them for a while in order to know how these things are done, but nevertheless his thoughts and his ideals are just as valuable to the country the first day he comes here as they are, perhaps, 15 or 20 years later. These men go on committees, and no matter what committee they may be on, that committee should meet regularly and have important legislation to consider, and we should have the experience and the benefit of every Member of Congress on committees. In other words, there should be no such thing as a so-called "minor committee." Every committee should be a valuable one, and I am sincere when I say that I hope the Rules Committee will look into this question at length and try to send labor legislation to the Labor Committee, interstate commerce legislation to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and ways and means legislation to the Ways and Means Committee, and so forth, and not have a small coterie of 15 or 20 men in the House of Representatives enacting all the legislation for the people of the United States, because this is what it amounts to today. I hope this matter will be given very careful consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want at this time to congratulate the two committees, together with the Rules Committee, for this move. Transportation is the lifeblood of commerce. We must have the rails, we must have the trucks, and we must have the waterways. I know this by personal experience in having shipped many millions of tons of freight over these routes.

I do not believe any one committee capable of passing on the freight structure of waterways, trucks, and rails. The railroad-minded man is not a truckman. The waterway-minded man is not a rail man. This country has developed to a point in rail, water, and truck transportation where we must have these three services. I have no patience with any-one who says that two must die for the sake of the other—whichever two it may be.

The farmers must have cheap transportation. We must give it to them in some way. On the other hand, you cannot have transportation service unless it meets the conditions and the requirements of the shippers. These are paramount.

If this rule will lead to something that is of benefit to the transportation agencies and their employees and result in giving the shippers of this country better service in the way of quicker transit time and lower rates, we should everyone be for it.

I am not canceling out of my mind the railroads. As I have said, we have to have them. We have to have the men on the railroads paid a fair and decent wage so they can maintain the service that the rails must give us in order to meet the shippers' requirements and hold their tonnage, and I hope that in the future consideration of any matters pertaining to transportation you will keep in mind the thought that the truck operator must be given peculiar consideration in behalf of the technical problems he must meet, and, likewise, the waterway agencies and the railroads must have consideration for those problems they must meet. Requirements of the shippers as well as the operating problems are all very different as between trucks, rails, and waterways.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

House Resolution 130

Resolved, That those Members of the House elected to the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries are hereby elected to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and all records and papers of the Committee on the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries are hereby transferred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

That all bills, resolutions, papers, documents, petitions, and memorials heretofore referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries are hereby referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLAND, a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT WITH RESPECT TO RICE

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 121.

House Resolution 121

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 5221, a bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act with respect to rice. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to make in order H. R. 5221, reported unanimously from the Committee on Agriculture, which has for its purpose the application of the processing tax to the production of rice.

Rice, by action of the House, was made a basic product in the administration of the agricultural adjustment bill. It was thought that it would carry out the parity principle through the marketing agreements which went into effect on October 1933 in which the producers of rice entered.

But it seems that during the time the agreement has been in operation there has gone into hands of the purchasers of rice and the act of many producers holding rice, until there is a surplus of 225,000,000 pounds.

The processing tax cannot be applied to rice before the 1st day of August. It is the desire of those interested in the production and marketing of rice that this processing tax shall be applied the 1st of March of this year in order that the product now held may be placed on the market and provide the benefit of parity price through the application of the processing tax.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I yield.

Mr. SNEIL. I think that is the most important part of the whole bill, and I wish the gentleman would be more explicit so that the average man can understand what he means by giving him the benefit, and how you are going to do it.

Mr. DRIVER. I did not intend to go thoroughly into the provisions of the bill at this time.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman prefers to do it later, that will be all right.

Mr. DRIVER. I would prefer to have that gone into by those in charge of the bill when the bill is offered for consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Very well.

Mr. DRIVER. I believe the House will not hesitate to adopt the rule making in order the consideration of the bill because of its importance, and I will only advert to so much as will bring to the House the value and necessity of the legislation

The emergency which justifies the application of the rule on the part of the committee is a desire to enable the holders of rice to place it on the market and dispose of it before the incoming of the crop this year. The quoted value today on blue rice, which is regarded as being about the average, is 31/2 cents per pound. Three and a half cents per pound is 1 cent less than the parity to which we have attained in the application to the basic crops which the Agricultural Department deals with, and, therefore, it is a matter of such importance that I feel the rule is justified, in order to give consideration to the holders of the rice purchased under the marketing agreement, and giving to them nothing but what they would be reasonably entitled to in the way of enabling them to reach the world market with the surplus of 225,000,000 pounds. Our production of rice is about 1,100,-000,000 pounds. We use in a domestic way 700,000,000 pounds of rice. We have a small importation of rice largely because of a demand for a quality of rice different from that which we produce. We have this surplus now on our hands amounting to 225,000,000 pounds. The operation of the tax will be fully explained to you by those who are interested in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to oppose the adoption of the rule as the legislation is entitled to consideration. I am opposed to the bill which the rule will make in order because I believe it is wrong in principle and means a rise in tax of some $200,-000.000 to be placed upon the hard-pressed consumers of this country. The presence of this bill emphasizes how once having started the vicious habit of a processing tax there is no end. Everybody wants to share in what appears to be easy money. We will be continually confronted with new demands which will place further burdens upon the shoulders of the American people. The end will not come until a suffering people, unable longer to bear the burdens, will revolt. Every time you artificially force up the cost of living you do an injustice to those whose means remain unchanged, and particularly to the millions on the relief rolls who are obliged to do with less. I am of the opinion we are not going to help recovery by increasing the food bill of the people before there is recovery in their purchasing power. Neither do I believe in the destruction of crops, which are real wealth, as a step to recovery. These measures may bring a little temporary relief, but in the end react to the disadvantage of those they are designed to aid. I do not object to the rule, but wish to make my own position clear.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5221) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act with respect to rice, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5221, with Mr. McMillan in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Montet].

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, the reasons suggesting this proposed program for the rice industry are briefly these: After rice had been made a basic commodity in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the rice industry, which is localized in four States, Louisiana, Arkansas, California, and Texas, assembled and worked out a marketing agreement. With respect to this agreement, approximately 93 percent of the weighted volume of all commercial mills became signatories thereto, and approximately 7 percent of the weighted volume of these mills remained outside of the agreement. Approximately 98 percent of the rice growers joined in the program. However, by reason of having some 7 percent of the commercial mills not in the program, necessarily there followed considerable chiseling, which eventually wrecked the whole program. In other words, the stabilization of the rice industry through a marketing agreement proved ineffective. There was no way to enforce it. That became obvious last year, and the result has been that a good portion of last year's crop remained in the hands of the farmers. The mills were not willing to risk buying for speculative purposes, because they were fearful of the consequences by reason of the failure of the efficacy of the marketing agreement, and up to the time this program was worked out, most of the rice remained in the hands of the farmers. They were unable to move it and great distress existed through the whole of the riceproducing area. We had some 4,000,000 bags of rice still left in the hands of the growers because no one would buy for speculative purposes.

Later the commercial mills and the growers themselves realized that something had to be done to save the situation. Committees were appointed from both the processors and growers, and the legislation presented to the Congress is the result of the combined judgment of the committee of both the growers and the processors, as well as that of the Department of Agriculture. The committee unanimously took the position that the only way you could effectually execute a rice program was to give complete control to the Department of Agriculture through a processing-tax program and, contrary to the view expressed a few moments ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] that this bill would cost the consumers $200,000,000, since we produce only one billion and a quarter pounds of rice in this country, and, approximately 750,000,000 of that being consumed here, the tax itself will amount to much less than $10,000,000. However, it is the opinion of the Department of Agriculture that the processing tax will in no way increase the present price of rice to the consumer, because for the last 2 years, by reason of the marketing agreement. the industry has been able to hold up the price of rice somewhere near parity. This program will in no way increase that price. The trouble with the agreement was that by reason of its ineffectiveness there were no speculative buyers, and the growers themselves were caught with their rice on hand, and unable to move it. However, there will be no increase in the selling price of rice to the consumer, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the Department. Even the 1 cent a pound processing tax will not provide enough to bring rice up to its parity price. As I have just indicated, the program here suggested is absolutely agreeable to all cooperating millers and cooperating producers in the riceproducing sections of this country.

There is no purpose to reduce the present rice production, because during the last 5 years, by reason of economic conditions, that reduction has been taken care of. There was then a reduction in acreage and in production of some 20 percent, and this will make it possible for the Department to effectively stabilize the production we now have, and control it.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman care to yield for a question at this point?

Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Under section 2 at the top of page 3 of the report there is mentioned:

(2) The issuance of tax-payment warrants to growers who hold rough rice from the 1933 and 1934 crops and to millers holding stocks of rough rice which have been purchased at the prices specified in the existing marketing agreements and licenses. These warrants may be used in the payment of the processing tax or redeemed for cash by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Will the gentleman explain just what that means?

Mr. MONTET. To the best of my ability, I shall. There is just a small quantity of rice originating in 1933 and left on hand in the hands of the millers. Up to February 1 of this year there was left on hand a great quantity of rice carried over from the 1934 crop. As I said a moment ago, since this program has been initiated rice has been moving very rapidly, that is, since the 1st of February. Some 3,000,000 bags have been disposed of to the trade. There is probably a half million bags left. The idea of these tax-payment warrants is this: They are to be issued only to growers and processors who cooperated under the agreement. The mills have on hand considerable rice for which they paid the marketing agreement prices.

Those prices are a great deal above the world price. It will take approximately this 1 cent a pound to compensate them for the difference, if they went out and sold the rice at the world price. Hence, in order to compensate those processors and growers who cooperated, and in order to bring them to the level of the world price, it is proposed here that tax-payment warrants be issued to those growers and processors, so that they will not suffer a loss by reason of the fact that they cooperated under the marketing agreement.

Mr. SNELL. Well, I should like to get some information about this. Suppose I am a miller and I paid a processing tax on rice of 1 cent a pound, and I am unable to dispose of that rice as I expected for a profit, or even to get my money back. Now it is proposed by the terms of this bill that the Federal Government shall give me a tax-payment warrant back for that 1 cent, or, in other words, gives me a subsidy of 1 cent a pound on what I did not sell, and I can cash that with the Secretary of Agriculture. Is that correct?

Mr. MONTET. Yes, sir; or it can be used in the payment of future processing taxes.

Mr. SNELL. But the Federal Government, then, is subsidizing these people 1 cent a pound on rice they did not

Mr. MONTET. To that extent.
Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Montet] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Louisiana 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. The tax-payment certificate only goes to the miller or processor or owner of the rice that was produced in 1933 and 1934, which paid the contract price. He has not paid the processing tax on that rice, however, but in order to equalize his situation with the situation of the new crop, it is necessary to issue these tax-payment certificates because he has in good faith complied with the marketing agreement.

Mr. SNELL. Now, can the gentlemen tell me by what theory of government that is done? Suppose I bought something last year and I paid too much for it and I cannot sell it, then I can go to the Federal Government and the Federal Government will give me the amount that I paid last year. What new theory is that? I certainly never heard of this being done before.

Mr. MILLER. It is no new theory.

Mr. SNELL. Have we been doing that before?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Where?

Mr. MILLER. This simply equalizes the position of the man who has cooperated in good faith, under his agreement, with those who have not cooperated and who will receive the benefit of this act, by the processing tax of 1 cent.

Mr. SNELL. I may be dull, but I do not understand the gentleman. I bought this last year with the intention of selling it, did I not? I hoped to make a profit, but business was such I could not.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And I was not able to sell it. It was a mere marketing agreement. I was in business. I could not sell it. Now I am asking the Federal Government to pay me the difference between what I paid last year and the market price today. Is there anything wrong with my statement so far?

Mr. MILLER. Not as far as it goes; no, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Well, that is what I want to know.

Mr. MILLER. But it does not go far enough.

Mr. MONTET. It eliminates the payment of any tax on rice produced in 1933 and 1934. It is an exchange between the Government and the processor or holder of the rice.

Mr. SNELL. Why is it any exchange? I have not paid the Government anything. The gentleman says I have not paid the processing tax. To my mind it is simply a gift by the Federal Government of 1 cent per pound to the holders of the balance of the 1933 and 1934 crop.

Mr. MONTET. I will state to the gentleman the reason why it would not be unfair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Montet] has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want 5 minutes. I want to get some information about this matter.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman some further questions in order to get some information about this.

It seems to me from reading the report and from what the gentlemen have said, that these people own this rice. They bought it last year, say, at 4 cents a pound. Today they can sell it for not more than 3 cents; so we are passing 1 a bill in Congress to say that the Federal Government will give back that 1 cent a pound that they will lose on this rice. Is that not the fact?

Mr. MONTET. No; it is not.

Mr. SNELL. Just explain it to me. The other gentleman said it was.

Mr. MONTET. As was explained by the gentleman from Arkansas, the only people who will receive tax-payment certificates will be those growers and processors who cooperated under the marketing agreement; and under that marketing agreement the market price of rice was held up to a certain level. If these processors who accumulated that rice were to go on the market today and sell that rice for which they paid marketing agreement prices they would lose approximately a cent a pound, for the prices they paid are approximately a cent a pound above the present world market.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman fully. As a matter of fact when they bought that rice they expected to make money on it.

Mr. MONTET. Necessarily so.

Mr. SNELL. But because they did not they are asking Congress to assume the loss. I think that is a pretty logical explanation of the bill.

Mr. MONTET. I do not think the Government is to be out one cent under the operation of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Who is to pay this? How will the Secretary of Agriculture get the cash with which to pay it?

Mr. MONTET. Not a cent is to be paid out of the Treasury

Mr. SNELL. Where does the money come from, then?

Mr. MONTET. The Government will issue tax-payment certificates just on that rice produced or bought last year and for which an agreed price was paid, which was about a cent higher than the world price today. This extra 1 cent per pound is needed to bring it up to the price they paid

Mr. SNELL. If we do this for those who bought rice, why is not the man in my community who bought dry goods last year and paid processing taxes, but who, because of conditions of business, was not able to dispose of those goods at the price he paid for them, not entitled to come to the Government today and get relief?

Mr. MONTET. I am not prepared to tell the gentleman that he would not be; but we are dealing with rice.

Mr. SNELL. That is a very broad statement; and it bears out my contention that this is a bill simply to subsidize those who bought and produced rice and did not get their money

Mr. MONTET. No more so than many other subsidies that have been given to the interests of the gentleman's district in the East and those of other eastern and northern States.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman can point out any one case of subsidy comparable with this, I should like to have him do it.

Mr. MONTET. The farmers of the country, if the gentleman calls this a subsidy, are just having done for them a small portion of the justice they have been justly clamoring for for generations, and in no way measures up to the subsidies which in the past have been paid to special interests in that section of our country from whence the gentleman comes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman refuses to answer my question. It cannot be answered. I yield time to any gentleman on the majority side who thinks he can answer the question. No one asks for time. It cannot be answered.

Mr. MONTET. I would be glad to answer any question relative to the bill.

Mr. SNELL. If I have asked a question that is not relative to the bill I apologize. I have the floor; I yield to anybody who can answer me. It cannot be answered.

Mr. MONTET. I think the gentleman has been answered. Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order that I may direct two or three questions to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Montet], if he is willing to ] answer them

Is the legislation proposed by this bill permanent or temporary in character?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that this legislation is simply some changes to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which legislation will last for the emergency. This, therefore, is of the same duration as the emergency legislation, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which may be ended on proclamation by the President that the emergency has ended.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Is any definite time fixed in the bill as a limit for its duration?

Mr. JONES. There is no definite time fixed in the bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Is it left entirely to the discretion of the President to determine when the emergency has ceased? Mr. JONES. Within the discretion of the President unless the Congress before that time repeals the act.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Under the provisions of this bill it is then left to the discretion of the President to determine when the emergency has ceased to exist?

Mr. JONES. Under the original Agricultural Adjustment Act that is true, and this is an amendment of that act.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Would the gentleman approve legislation of this character as permanent legislation?

Mr. JONES. I think I would prefer to cross that bridge when I get to it. I do not think all of this emergency legislation is perfect in character, but I do feel that it has accomplished much good, and I think as we go along still more good will be accomplished. It is just like the transition of the automobile or any line of industry; things are perfected as they go along. Were the gentleman to go down to the Smithsonian Institution and look at the first automobile he would hesitate a long while before starting in it to Baltimore; but they did not quit with that car simply because it was not perfect.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Does this legislation set up any standards to guide or control the President in determining when the emergency has ceased to exist?

Mr. JONES. The original act does that; this is part of the original act.

Mr. WOLVERTON. What are the standards?

Mr. JONES. The parity price. It was recognized by every man in America who had studied the question that one of the chief causes of the condition in which we found ourselves was the paralysis that had resulted by virtue of the reduced purchasing power of the farmer. The act automatically becomes ineffective as to any commodity as of the date the parity price is reached.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES. On any of these commodities the processing tax practically ceases.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Is rice now on the floor of processing houses subject to this tax?

Mr. JONES. No; and that is one of the reasons they want these changes. They could levy this same tax without this bill, but there are some peculiar features about rice which made them want to make some changes applicable only to rice. It does not change the other features of the bill.

This permits the tax to go on before the beginning of the present marketing season and not have the benefit paid until a new season comes in, thus avoiding the floor tax.

Mr. WOLVERTON. My question is based on the assumption that those engaged in processing have at the present time stocks of rice on hand. It is for that reason I am asking whether this bill upon its enactment would affect that rice by the placing of this tax upon it?

Mr. JONES. It is my understanding it will not be taxed. These transfer warrants, as I understand it, are simply taxpaying warrants. The money collected goes into the Treasury. All of these major programs so far have been selfsupporting. The Treasury is not going to pay out anything actually.

Mr. WOLVERTON. In the event a processing house shall purchase imported rice, would such rice be subject to this processing tax?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. JONES. I would rather one of these other gentlemen answer that question, but I will give the gentleman my impression if he desires. I understand all foreign goods will be subject to the compensating tax. That is my understanding of its operation.

Mr. WOLVERTON. In addition to the present tariff duty? Mr. JONES. This has no bearing on the tariff. It may or may not be subject to the tariff, but whatever it is, this is in

Mr. WOLVERTON. There is a tariff duty at the present time on rice. I am therefore inquiring whether this proposed processing tax will be in addition to the present tariff duty now paid upon imported rice?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and this is in addition to whatever tariff there is. This is a compensating tax for this particular item and it is added on whether there is a tariff or not.

Mr. WOLVERTON. This goes far beyond the explanation given by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. JONES. No. That particular feature is in practically all of the provisions of the original bill covering basic commodities; at least that power exists.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Will this bill have the effect, as other legislation of similar character, of increasing the price of the commodity to the ultimate consumer?

Mr. JONES. That will altogether depend. I understand the present price of rice is something like satisfactory, and it probably will not increase the price materially.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Upon what theory does the gentleman feel this will not increase the price to the consumer when similar legislation has already done so with respect to other commodities subject to the processing tax?

Mr. JONES. Well, similar legislation has not increased materially the price to the consumer. Other conditions and other legislation and codes are more responsible for those increases. I think in some degree those things have nullified the provisions of this act, but that is another story altogether.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, there is heard frequently the suggestion that the processing fees have vastly increased the price paid by the consumer, but that is not correct. If you will analyze the additional cost involved in the processing fees, you will find that it amounts to so little that it will not be noticeable. Some excuses have been made, but other legislation, I believe, and other matters have had more to do with the general price level of finished articles. A great many people believe that some increases were essential so far as various commodities were concerned. The additional raw material cost in the various manufactured products made from basic items of the farm does not amount to enough to bother

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.
Mr. SHORT. The processing tax on cotton has doubled the price of overalls.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no. The processing tax on cotton has not increased the price of the finished overalls more than a few cents per pair. According to the Consumers' Counsel there are 2.2 yards of denim or 2.06 pounds of cotton in the average pair of overalls. The processing fee on cotton is 4.2 cents per pound. This would make an increased raw material cost of less than 9 cents per pair of overalls on account of the processing fee. According to the same authority the average price of overalls in July 1933 was $1.09. The average price in January 1935 was $1.59-22 cities. The rise includes not only the processing fee but increase in the price of cotton, in cost of manufacturing, salary to textile workers, and other costs.

Mr. SHORT. May I say that in northern Arkansas a year ago the farmers received from $18 to $20 an acre for not planting cotton, and on some of those acres you could not grow enough cotton to make a shirt tail.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further. The gentleman does not want information. He wants to argue, even in the face of facts.

As a matter of fact, the actual price of the cotton in a pair of overalls at present prices is not as much as 30 cents, and the raw material cost of the cotton in a cotton shirt is less than 8 cents.

Mr. SHORT. A certain quality and brand of overalls you could buy for 75 cents before the processing tax was put on today costs $1.35.

Mr. JONES. Well, if the gentleman wants to go back to the conditions which prevailed at the time he speaks of, he can go alone. I know of no one who wants to go with him.

Mr. SHORT. I am telling the gentleman the situation in Arkansas. I do not know how it is in Amarillo.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman states that is due to this act, but it is not true. I invite the gentleman to come to Amarillo. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McClellan].

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, the major part of the rice-growing section of Arkansas is in my district. I do not happen to live in that particular section but I am familiar with some of their problems.

It is the purpose of this industry, of course, to cooperate with the Government in its program. This they have been seeking to do. Since the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act they have been trying to operate under a marketing agreement. Generally, they have complied with this agreement. They entered into it in good faith and have sought to comply with it. By reason of its being a voluntary agreement, those who did enter into it reduced their acreage in an attempt to reduce production so as to raise the price. There are others who did not enter into this agreement and who have not cooperated with the Government.

This bill is for the benefit of those who have undertaken to cooperate with the Government in its program. As a result, under the marketing agreement, with the price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, the price has been materially upheld, but now you are faced with this situation. Those who undertook to, and did market their rice, who were not cooperating with the Government, have been able to sell and dispose of theirs. Those who have cooperated in good faith, many of them have not sold their rice and the rice is in the hands of the producers.

Now, in order to make this act operate so as to protect all alike and to benefit and sustain those who have tried to cooperate with the Government in its recovery program, they now propose this processing tax so as to equalize these benefits.

The question was asked about this measure providing a profit to the miller who has purchased rice by reason of these tax certificates being issued to him. This is not true. He has already paid for that rice the price fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture and has helped to hold up the price, and it would be manifestly unfair and unjust to again put a processing tax on this rice that he has purchased, and for which he has paid the minimum price as fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture in an attempt to cooperate with the Government.

I may say that the folks in my section favor the enactment of this measure and I trust you will give it your support.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the most amazing bills that has ever come before this House. They entered into a rice marketing agreement sometime last year for the ostensible and distinct purpose of holding up the price. Now, some of the gentlemen down in the Southland who are rice growers and processors and millers cooperated with the program in order to hold it up, while others did not. However, there was nothing mandatory in the law which compelled them to cooperate.

They accumulated a lot of rice. A lot of the smart boys unloaded their rice and got the price while the getting was good and while there was a market for it. There is now a lot of rice down there, probably several hundred million pounds, that has not been disposed of, and they now find that the market has been sort of shut off or the market for rice has been more or less saturated. These gentlemen therefore are not going to realize the price they expected, and therefore after venturing into what is distinctly a speculative undertaking, they come to the Congress of the United States and say, "Gentlemen, we may lose $10,000,000 on this deal, so we are asking that you pass legislation imposing a processing tax of 1 cent a pound on rough rice so that we may be reimbursed, or at least that we may be subsidized against this loss."

As I understand it, this is the way the situation appears in this bill. Now, they say, very naively, that you do not dip into the Treasury. Certainly you do not, but you are going to pay 1 cent a pound, or about $10,000,000, before this demand is liquidated, and who pays it? For the benefit of those few folks down in the South, the rice eaters in the various districts in Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Kansas, and every other State are going to pay it. They are going to pay it in every section of the country, and one might explain it on the basis of insurance. For instance, it is just like all the people in the country undertaking to spread and absorb the burden of those who are going to lose money in a speculative venture down there, and I think in this respect the bill is essentially bad.

Now, there is a little item in the report which came with this bill which states this:

However, unless a plan comparable to the one embodied in this proposed legislation is soon initiated which will stimulate buying, the grower probably will be forced to start making price concessions.

This tax must necessarily be added to the cost that the consumer is going to pay. Perhaps the cost of the processing tax in connection with cotton, as discussed a moment ago, is not reflected very largely in cotton goods, but if rice sells for a nickel a pound and you add this tax, that tax adds 20 percent more, which you are adding to the consumption cost imposed upon the people everywhere in this country.

How is it going to work out? You are going to set up a sales resistance, the same as we have at the present time in connection with pork. I was in Chicago last Saturday. and I found there was a consumers' strike everywhere and that they had actually processed fewer hogs that day than they had at any time in the last 5 years, and why? It is not very difficult to understand. Here is a working man making $17 a week, which is the present general wage of many industries in my State at the present time. He has just so much, namely, $17 or $16 or $18, which must be budgeted for food, clothing, and rent. Rents go up a little bit, and he has to squeeze off of the clothing and the food allowance in his family budget. Then if prices go up, as in the case of pork chops, where the price has risen from 18 cents a pound to 28 cents in the butcher shops of Illinois in the last 6 or 7 months, it means he can eat pork chops perhaps once a week, whereas otherwise he would eat them twice a week. The result is an immediate curtailment of consumption, a drop in bulk-sales volume, and a recession in production of consumers' goods.

I do not blame this on the processing tax, but this is what you have to bear in mind: There is always a certain psychology that goes along with this. If processors get a chance to add 1 cent for processing tax, they may also get a chance to exploit the market and add 2 cents, and the other cent is put in their pockets by way of profit, and this is what often happens in connection with a measure of this kind. Here is a fixed family budget, and here are folks whose wages are barely enough to subsist them, and if you pass legislation resulting in rising prices, the result is what? A buyers' strike similar to what you are having at the present time with respect to so many products. The report of the Consumers' Council of the A. A. A. is eloquent of the rise in the cost of living, and soon the high cost of living will become an outstanding problem.

So consumption goes down, and then what about this observation I have referred to in the report? Instead of stimulating purchases, instead of stimulating consumption, you have simply set up a factor that is adverse to and retards consumption and you defeat the whole purpose of the bill. I think it is a bad bill. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 7½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kansas, 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Bolleau].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I think it is important to realize in this connection that the rice producers in the South have in the last 2 years tried to some extent to stabilize their own industry by causing a material reduction of the acreage of rice.

Those who came before the committee in support of the bill stated that there has been a reduction of about 20 percent in the acreage of planted rice during the last 5 years. It is important to note that some of the reduction took place as the result of the tendency on the part of the growers to reduce production. Only a small part was affected last year during the operation of the marketing agreement. But it shows conclusively that some interest has been taken during the last 2 years in the profitable growing of rice, and for that reason they have reduced production year after year, until they have taken a good deal of land out of rice production.

I believe if we enact this legislation it will have the effect of stabilizing the industry. I am satisfied that if they have the acreage down to where it ought to be, the result will be beneficial. If we are to do anything that would tend to increase the price of rice without having some control over the amount of acreage, the benefits that would accrue as the result of this program would be lost, because the program would defeat itself by increasing the production. I believe it will have the effect of increasing and keeping the price of rice up where it belongs.

So far as I know, there is no opposition to this bill on the part of the producers. It seems to meet their approval. They feel that it will help their industry, and I am convinced that if we can help the industry and not increase the cost to the consumer, we should do so.

The suggestion has been made that the operation of the bill might cause some drain on the National Treasury. I must say that the processing tax to be levied on the domestic and foreign production of rice, that is rice consumed in this country, will provide a sufficient amount in the form of revenue to take care of any expenditures that might be incurred by the Department of Agriculture, as a result of the operation of the Act. I do not believe the result of this act will cause any drain on the Federal Treasury. I believe it to be self-sustaining and that it will be self-supporting. I for one want to join those men from the rice-producing States in asking Congress to approve the legislation.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, a great many curses are flung at the processing tax, from the standpoint of raising prices to the consumer. I think it enters into the price that the consumer has to pay, and I think the N. R. A. code has a great deal to do with it. I think a lot of other things have to do with the price the consumer has to pay. At the same time I cannot, after a lot of study and some experience, reconcile myself to the belief that the processing taxes are the salvation of the rice grower, the sugar grower, or any other farmer of the United States. When the price of the processing tax is placed on rice, it will work out something like this, and if I am not correct I wish some rice man would correct me. Once this goes on and you start shipping out rice, rice is billed to the wholesale jobber at, we will say, 2½ cents per pound—100 bags of 100 pounds each, say-$250. On the bottom of that invoice there will probably be, "Plus processing tax, 1 cent per pound, $100." The retailer receives that invoice from the wholesale jobber. He looks at the invoice and he says, "I shall mark up the price of rice." He will probably mark it up 11/2 cents in addition to the price he would have marked it up in the absence of the tax, and when the consumer comes in and says, "What's the matter with rice, that it is up a dollar and a half a hundred", he will say, "We had to put on a processing tax." When that takes place the consumer will start looking around for potatoes or some substitute for rice and the chances are that he will shift away from the consumption of rice, but if the consumer takes it, he will undoubtedly pay an additional price for the rice over what he pays at the present time.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in the uniqueness of this bill. I cannot understand why the rice producer and the friends of the rice industry should come in here and ask that a provision of this kind be placed in the bill. The remark has also been made that this will probably not reduce the acreage of rice at the present time. If there is a surplus and if the price of rice is now 1 cent per pound over the world parity and if the farmers are now clamoring for loans with which to finance their 1935 crop, what will happen to the surplus of rice which will result from the 1935 crop when the surplus coming therefrom is added to the surplus at the present time? Is there any rice man here who will answer that question for me, if he cares to answer it? I want to know what they propose to do with the surplus of rice that will come from the 1935 crop when it is added to the 225,000,000-pound surplus which you have at the present time?

Mr. DEROUEN. I think the gentleman is not well informed. There is no surplus. We are trying to protect the farmers. The big institutions today are not buying the raw material and the farmers are holding it. This is a farmers' bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. You had a marketing agreement, and from that remark I would take it that the processors of rice have rigged the marketing agreement to the end that the grower of rice holds the bag and the rice.

Here is another thing I want to drop in at this time. Under what kind of a marketing agreement does the grower of rice now sell his rice to the processor? Take these farm products and analyze them carefully, and you will find that in most every case the processor has a way of buying the raw goods from the farmer on some kind of a purchasing contract which does not give the farmer a square deal.

One needs only to refer to the purchasing contracts which run between milk producers and processors, rice producers and processors, wheat producers and wheat processors, corn, hog, beef, wool, sugar beets, and many other farm-crop producers and processors to have sufficient proof to remove all doubt about this statement of fact. When farm products have the last few years been selling at starvation prices to farmers the operating profits of processors have been mounting. The farmer is an unorganized vender or seller of his labor in the form of farm products. He does not receive the benefits which flow from protection on farm goods simply because he sells those goods on the wrong kind of a sales contract running between the farmer and the processor. There is nothing in "processing taxes" to correct this fundamental wrong. The processing tax and parity-payment procedure takes the parity price away from the consumer and in most cases permits the processor to lower the amount he pays to the farmer. This is because the farmer is in a way "guaranteed parity" by the Government which collects the sum through assessment of the processing tax to the consumer. Where will the farmer be when the processing taxes are no longer assessed and benefit payments cease? What the farmer should do is to place himself in position to force the processor to pay the farmer a reasonable share of the market value which the processor receives for the goods. Any program which fails in this respect is unfair and unsound to the American farmer and consumer and discriminates in favor of the processor. The processor reasons that if the Government and consumer is to pay the farmer parity, why should the processor pay a reasonable price for the raw farm products. These are the cold facts we as a Congress face, and the farmers of this country expect us to pass a law now and then which protects them in the sale of their goods to the processors and which gives the farmer cost plus a profit for his goods the same as N. R. A. protects the processor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Martin].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the mechanics of this particular bill and had not intended to ask any time on it until I was struck by statements of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Montet] explaining why their rice-marketing agreement under the Agricultural Adjustment Act had failed. It had failed, as I recall his statement largely due to the fact that about 2 percent of the growers and about 7 percent of the processors would not sign up, and that recalled an experience that I had extending over a period of a year with another agricultural commodity, to wit, edible beans.

Rice is a big agricultural industry in Louisiana. Wheat is a big agricultural industry in some other sections. Out in the Rocky Mountain section and in some of the other sections of the country, beans constitute a great agricultural commodity, ranking seventh in value in my State among agricultural commodities in the way of importance. I carried on a campaign for almost a year to get something done for edible dried beans, particularly the pinto bean produced in the Rocky Mountain region. I initiated and carried on a campaign that resulted in bean buying on the part of the Government. When that failed to help the market, due largely to the way it was handled, we started to get a marketing agreement. We worked on that for months.

We held State hearings, we held regional hearings, and we held national hearings embracing all bean-growing areas, until finally there was produced what the officials down in the A. A. A., handling these agreements and processing-tax matters, said was the finest marketing agreement ever worked out under the Department of Agriculture. It did not get as far as the rice agreement, which was wrecked by the chiselers and hold-outs and bootleggers. They failed to sign up because the retailers held out for fixed margins and fixed resale prices, and meanwhile the drought came along and wiped out the 1934 crop, and sent beans sky-high, and made a lot of the growers feel that they could get all they wanted for their beans without a marketing agreement, and, therefore, it was not entered into. But a good crop year will break the market down, just as it was broken down by former surpluses. Due to that failure to get a marketing agreement I have introduced a bill making edible beans a basic commodity, and that is why I am on the floor now, calling this matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture and its chairman. Potatoes were mentioned a moment ago. A potato bill has been introduced. It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that agriculture in this country has to be regulated. The farmers must regulate the output and marketing of their products and stabilize prices if they expect to preserve the agricultural industry in this country and get anything out of it. It is the farmer who needs this protection. The big packers do not go broke. The big elevator men and the big mill men do not go broke. All of these big organized interests in Chicago, Kansas City, and St. Louis, which make millions out of the farmers, do not need this legislation. They do not need legislation setting up quotas, regulating production, imposing processing taxes, which is only a part of the mechanism and not the objective of the thing. They will get by. They always have gotten by. It is the farmer who goes broke and always will be broke until he gets some regulation of his industry, and the Government through this legislation is simply showing him the way. Apparently this is the only way now it can be done. The farmer has nothing to risk on this legislation; he is already broke.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Martin] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DeRouen].

Mr. Derouen. Mr. Chairman, I shall not be able to speak long or stand long. I am just out of the hospital, as most of you know. I have made a careful study of this bill. It meets the approval of all growers of the States of California, Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana, as well as the approval of the millers and the processors. In fact, all parties interested in rice and the processing of agricultural products have approved of this bill. I am asking you to help pass this bill today in order to restore to the farmers a parity price. It will not raise the price, as many seem to think. It will not create that condition.

Mr. Chairman, H. R. 5221, the proposed amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, has been developed in a series of conferences with the rice section of the A. A. A., rice growers and millers, and other Congressmen interested in the growing of rice, and the proposed legislation represents the views of the rice industry as to changes desirable to meet an increasingly critical situation in the rice industry.

To this end this bill proposes to attain three principal objectives, to wit:

First. To maintain prices at present levels throughout the remainder of this marketing season.

Second. To move the surplus of rice from the 1933-34 crops into the channels of trade.

Third. To permit a change from a marketing-agreement program to a production-adjustment program in such a manner as will avoid any adverse effect on the interest of growers or the trade.

This bill proposes specifically, first, the levying of a processing tax beginning March 15, 1935. Without such a provision in the law a processing tax could not be made effective until the beginning of the next marketing year, August 1, 1935. Second. The issuance of tax-payment warrants to growers who hold rough rice from the 1933–34 crops and to millers holding stocks of rough rice which have been purchased at the prices specified in the existing marketing agreements and licenses. These warrants may be used in the payment of processing taxes or redeemed for cash by the Secretary of Agriculture. Third. The elimination of a floorstocks tax on clean rice now in the hands of millers, jobbers, retailers, or others in the trade who have stocks on hand in order to exempt from the tax all old-crop rice for which the marketing-agreement price has been paid.

If the plan proposed in this bill operates as may be reasonably expected, it would mean that surplus stocks of 1933 and 1934 crops will have moved into foreign consumption at world prices and the growers will not be carrying heavy stocks of rough rice as they enter upon a program of production adjustment with benefit payments to cooperators.

The continued holding of large stocks by the growers instead of the trade would probably mean that the grower soon would be compelled to sacrifice his rice at lower prices. While from the point of view of the market, supplies are not of unmanageable proportions, from the point of view of the growers, his unsold rice is becoming a distressing problem. Creditors are pressing for the payment of loans made for 1934 production purposes and the farmer will soon need funds to plant his 1935 crop. There is increasing pressure to liquidate his 1934 rice, and, it should be emphasized, while some growers have sold all of their rice, others have not sold a bag.

Prices to growers through the marketing agreements have been maintained at satisfactory level. However, unless a plan comparable to the one embodied in this proposed legislation is soon initiated—which will stimulate buying—the grower probably will be forced to make price concessions. When price concessions are begun, it is believed there is a grave possibility of the price structure collapsing, in spite of provisions of the marketing agreements, which are designed to effect stability in price. The late seller—the grower who did not immediately market his rice but held it, to market it in an orderly manner—will be penalized.

The necessity for dealing with rice in the manner proposed in the bill lies in the fact that prices have been maintained during the current marketing season through marketing agreements and licenses at a level almost 1 cent per pound above world prices. In order to move the surplus into the channels of trade, it would probably be necessary to either terminate the marketing agreements and licenses at the effective date of the processing tax or reduce the prices specified in them. In either case it is expected that the market price would decline to world-price level. If growers should not receive tax-payment warrants covering unsold rice, they would receive only the market price, which would mean that those growers who had not sold prior to that time would receive substantially less than those growers who had sold. This would be unfair and inequitable.

Unless the floor-stock tax is eliminated and millers are issued tax-payment warrants covering rough rice purchased at prices specified in marketing agreements and licenses, practically no purchases would be made until the effective date of the tax. This would result in disorderly marketing conditions and would affect growers' interests adversely, and it would also penalize those millers holding large stocks of rice. Should a floor-stock tax be collected in the rice industry, the costs of the particular lots of rice held by millers and others in the trade at the time the processing tax becomes effective would be substantially more than the cost of rice sold by them prior to and purchased by them following the effective date of the tax.

Of course, only the cooperating farmers will receive the benefit payments from the processing tax. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not involve the establishment of any new principle or even the extension of an existing principle as far as farm legislation is concerned. Rice is a basic agricultural commodity at the present time. It would be possible to put a processing tax on rice without this legislation or any legislation, but there are certain unusual situations in the rice industry which make it advisable to put into effect a variation of the processing-tax plan which has been applied to other commodities. Hence this bill.

Now, this is the situation with reference to rice that was presented to our committee: There has been a marketing agreement by which the price of rice has been increased considerably above what it was prior to the time that agreement was put into effect. That agreement has kept the price in this country approximately 1 cent a pound above the world price. We have exported considerable quantities of rice in the past, and because we have had this fixed price, higher than the world price, there has been a considerable decrease in our exports of rice. While there is no burdensome surplus at present, as long as that condition continues there is danger of piling up a supply which will vitally affect the price to the grower. The processing tax offers the best solution of that problem, because under the processing-tax plan you can have a domestic price equal to the world price, plus the processing tax, and you can sell the surplus on the basis of the world price. That is the advantage, as I see it, that this plan has over the marketing plan which has been in effect.

In addition to that, this plan will probably be more effective in controlling the acreage and production of rice, because under the marketing agreement there have been a few who have not cooperated, yet they have gotten the benefit of the plan. Under the processing-tax plan those who do not cooperate do not get the benefit of the plan. There is no reason to believe that this measure will increase the cost of rice to the consumer, because the bill itself fixes the processing tax at 1 cent a pound until July 1, 1936, and that is approximately the amount that the present price is above the world price. So this legislation in itself should not and will not, in my judgment, increase the price of rice to the consumer. There may be some other factor which will do that within the next year, but I do not believe we can fairly say that this legislation in itself will do so. It seems to me only fair, in view of the fact that we have put the processing tax in effect on other commodities that we should use it for rice, which is an important crop in four of our States. Furthermore, the processing tax which is fixed in this bill will not of itself bring the price of rice to parity.

My view of the matter is that as long as a processing tax does not bring the price of an agricultural commodity up to parity that we need not worry very much about the effect of that tax on the consumer. If the processing taxes were to put a load on the consumer and drive prices above parity. then we might well become concerned, but not until then.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (a) of section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by striking out the comma after the words "except that" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(1)"; and by striking out the period at the end of said second sentence and inserting a comma and the following: "and (2) in the case of rice, the Secretary of Agriculture shall, before March 1, 1935, proclaim that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect thereto, and the processing tax shall be in effect on and after March 1, 1935."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Jones: On pages 1, 2, 6, and 7 where the word "March 1" appears, insert "March 15."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many more or less formal and clerical amendments which were adopted in the committee. It was intended that the bill should be reintroduced. But this was not done.

I now ask unanimous consent that the bill be read as amended and that unless a question is raised as to an amendment, that the language in each paragraph as amended be considered the language of the bill.

This procedure is a little unusual, but I can see no objection to it. If any Member wishes to raise an objection to a particular amendment the objection can be considered when the amendment is reached in the reading of the bill. I make this suggestion only in the interest of saving time, for there are a number of correcting amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill be read in the manner indicated. The Chair may suggest for the information of the membership that the amendments may be read or attention may be called to any particular amendment.

Mr. JONES. I do not mean committee amendments we may offer from the floor. I refer to the amendments that are indicated in the printed bill; and if any Member desires to object or raise any question about any such amendment, the agreement will not apply to the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent further that the RECORD show the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the amendments be incorporated in the RECORD.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments referred to are as follows:

On page 2, line 19, after "pound" and before the comma insert " of rough rice."

On page 2, line 19, strike out "thereof" and insert in lieu thereof "of such rate."

thereof "of such rate."

On page 2, strike out line 25 and lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "rice, the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to a processor, except that where the producer processes his own rice the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to the place of processing."

On page 3, strike out lines 16 to 24, both inclusive, and lines 1 and 2 on page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) The term 'rough rice' means rice in that condition which is usual and customary when delivered by the producer to a as he shall, by order,".

On page 9, after line 19, insert the following:
"Sec. 11. Subsection (a) of section 17 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by inserting after the second sentence the following: 'In the case of rice, a tax due under this title which has been paid by a tax-payment warrant shall be deemed for the purposes of this subsection to have been paid; and, any provision of law notwithstanding, the Comptroller General is authorized and directed to certify for payment (without review of the fact of payment of such tax) any refund of a tax so paid, in the amount scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue." Internal Revenue.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask further that these amendments be agreed to en bloc with the understanding that any of the amendments may be questioned as they are reached in the reading of the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Subsection (d) of section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by renumbering paragraph (7) as paragraph (8) and by inserting after paragraph (6) the following:

"(7) In the case of the

"(7) In the case of rice—
"(A) The term 'rough rice' means rice in that condition which is usual and customary when delivered by the producer to a processor.

"(B) The term 'processing' means the cleaning, shelling, milling (including custom milling for toll as well as commercial milling), grinding, rolling, or other processing (except cleaning by or for the producer thereof for seed purposes, and drying) of rough the case of rough rice with respect to which a taxrice; and in the case of rough rice with respect to which a tax-payment warrant has been previously issued or applied for, the term 'processing' means any one of the above-mentioned processings or any preparation or handling in connection with the sale or other disposition thereof.

"(C) The term 'cooperating producer' means any person (including any share-tenant or share-cropper) whom the Secretary of Agriculture finds to be willing to participate in the 1935 productionadjustment program for rice.

"(D) The term 'processor', as used in subsection (b-1) of section 15 of this title, means any person (including a cooperative association of producers) engaged in the processing of rice on a commercial basis (including custom milling for toll as well as commercial milling)."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Jones: Page 4, line 13, insert after the word "except" the following: "grinding or cracking by or for the producer thereof for food for his own livestock and." Page 4, line 14, strike out the word "thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

tence thereof, after the comma following the words "rental and benefit payments", the words "redemption of tax-payment warrants issued under the provisions of subsection (b-1) of section 15 of this title."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Jones: Page 5, line 19, change the capital "I" to a small "i."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Subsection (e) of section 15 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by inserting after the word "Provided" the following: "(1) That in the event any of the provisions of this title have been or are hereafter made applicable to any possession of the United States in the case of any particular commodity or commodities, but not generally, this title, for the purposes of this subsection, shall be deemed applicable to such possession with respect to such commodity or commodities but shall not be deemed applicable to such possession with respect to other commodities."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Jones: Page 10, line 13, after the word "commodities", change the period to a semicolon and insert the following: "and (2)—".

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

Mr. Chairman, 17 days from now the pink-slip amendment, section 55 (b) to the Internal Revenue Law of 1934, will become effective. That provision was in effect once before. It remained in effect 1 year and was then repealed. In the last session of Congress this law was again revived in another legislative body and finally became a part of the 1934 Revenue Act.

The so-called "pink-slip law" provides that any person filing an income-tax return must show on the pink slip attached to the return his gross income, deductions, and net income. This must be filed with your income-tax return for the year 1934; and if you fail to do it, the Collector of Internal Revenue will do it for you and charge you $5 to be added to your income tax.

This provision of the act, which has now become known as the "pink slip", is causing a lot of people to see red; and I, like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bell], who took the floor yesterday, am receiving many telegrams and letters protesting this provision of the act. I think the provision is unjust for the reason that it does not disclose the actual condition of the taxpayer, for even though a person's return might show a net income of $5,000, it does not necessarily follow that the person had $5,000 left at the end of the year.

You may have had obligations to pay; you may have had death and sickness in your family, for which you can take no deductions; nevertheless, your income-tax report shows you did have that much left.

What does it do? What effect does it have upon you? It means that any snooper, any high-pressure salesman, any racketeer or bandit may come to the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Government and get the information for every base desire on the part of that element in our country. They can find out just exactly what your income was, and then go back to your community, give the information to your competitor, or use it in their own behalf to sell you the things you do not want or need, and, if not that, place the information in the hands of any contribution solicitor, who will make demands upon you. If you do not subscribe to the things they ask, you will be confronted with the fact that your income return showed a net income of $5,000; that you are able to do it, but you did not do it and thereby you are humiliated and embarrassed in your own community, although unable financially to comply and be compelled to defend yourself against such action. It makes the Government of the United States a bureau of information for the criminal element of the country and a paradise for gossipers.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. BELL. Does not the gentleman think that it would SEC. 7. Subsection (b) of section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting in the first sen- be very helpful if all the Members of Congress would get in touch with the Ways and Means Committee and urge an immediate hearing on this matter?

Mr. DONDERO. Certainly; and I hope that before the 15th day of March the Ways and Means Committee will see fit to report to this House, not a postponement of this law or a modification of the law, but an absolute repeal of that particular section of the law. Let us return to the same provision as contained in the act of 1926, which made the information available to any proper agent or officer of the Government who had a right to see what your income-tax return did show.

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask, in good faith, whether anyone can take the floor of this House of Representatives and show what good purpose this law serves to the Government of the United States. Someone has stated that it makes a man honest. In my judgment it makes him dishonest, because rather than disclose the privacy of his business to every criminal agency in the land he will try to find a way to avoid giving the information.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.
Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman know that there are 29 States in the Union that have income-tax laws, and that only 1 of them, the State of Wisconsin, requires a pink slip to be made out?

Mr. DONDERO. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that if this law is to remain in effect, there should be a provision added whereby anyone seeking information in reference to any taxpayer shall give his name, his purpose, and reasons for requesting the information before it is given to him, and notice should be served on the taxpayer telling him who is looking up the

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully refer the gentleman from Michigan to the Ways and Means Committee for solution of this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McMillan, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5221) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act with respect to rice, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 121, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment. If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Hook, on account of illness.

To Mrs. Kahn, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in

To Mr. Stewart, for Thursday and Friday next, on account of hearings held in his district on two surveys, as requested by Rivers and Harbors Committee.

To Mr. Fernandez, for 10 days, on account of important

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to submit, as an example of the excellent management of the Honorable Bayard C. Wilson, State manager of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for Wyoming, a report of the activities of the Wyoming agency of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation from the date of its inception, August 10, 1933, up to and including January 15, 1935.

The statement reflects a careful analysis of an efficient and carefully managed branch of this important agency.

There is an urgent need for additional funds with which to complete further worthy loans in Wyoming, and I trust that Congress will soon appropriate funds for the purpose of the furtherance of the good work of this institution.

REPEAL OF PUBLICITY OF INCOME-TAX RETURNS PROVISION OF REVENUE ACT OF 1934

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to the publicity feature of the income-tax law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make an appeal to the Members of this House to repeal the vicious provision in the 1934 Internal Revenue Act authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make available to public inspection and examination the summary of income-tax returns, thus encroaching on the privacy to which every American citizen

The already overburdened taxpayers in the United States are particularly resentful of section 55 of the 1934 law which not only makes them victims of blackmail, kidnapers, racketeers, and other gangs of the underworld, not only opens the way for snooping neighbors and business competitors to scrutinize their affairs, but which obviously assumes that the average American is dishonest. Our people resent the stigma which the Congress, in a fit of hysteria, cast upon them by compelling them to submit to this provision, and they de-

The provision falls not alone on the man of wealth but on the middleman struggling to pay his taxes, to meet his mortgage and insurance payments, and to give his children an education. The small taxpayer, even more than the large, strenuously protests having his earnings paraded before the busybodies in his neighborhood and against a law which makes him the prey of snoopers and the salesmen of worthless certificates.

The most bitter criticism of the opening of the Internal Revenue Bureau's records to the public has been based on what has been termed the "unwarranted intrusion of the Government in private affairs." When the income-tax law was passed something over a decade ago, it was the distinct understanding of the people that returns would be kept confidential. Had there been any intimation at that time that the Congress would go beyond all reasonable limits and throw the tax lists open to the public, I venture to say there is not the slightest question that the bill would have been defeated.

Leaders in both parties have condemned and opposed the proposal. In a masterly report of the case as early as June 14, 1918, Cordell Hull, a former Member of this House, afterward a Member of the Senate, and now Secretary of State, wrote:

I have investigated and reached my individual conclusion with respect to the proposed general publicity of income-tax returns solely from the standpoint of the most satisfactory and successful administration of the income-tax law and the securing of the largest possible yield of revenue. Viewed from this standpoint, I have been unable to bring myself to the conclusion that publicity would secure the most desirable revenue results. I may first refer to the experience of some governments which have tried out income taxation for the longest periods. England, after 75 years' experience with her present income-tax law, retains her policy of keeping the results secret. There is no demand from any source, so far as I am advised, for publicity of English income-tax returns.

Holland retains secrecy under her income-tax law, which has been in operation some 25 years. Denmark pursues the same policy of secrecy under her income-tax law, in operation for 14 years; Austria pursues the same policy under her law, enacted some 75 years ago; Canada's recent income-tax law contains the same provision; France in her recent law has some form of secrecy, the exact nature and extent of which I am not definitely informed. This policy of these different countries, after many years' trial, is controlled entirely by the question of the most satisfactory administration and the largest revenue yield of their respective laws. They evidently have not felt justified in allowing considerations of collateral or other government policies, however strongly and plausibly urged, to effect a change in this policy.

Whatever may be thought or said to the contrary, there is a phase of human nature which, while entirely willing to make full and complete returns of income and pay taxes accordingly in the belief that all taxpayers are receiving equitable treatment, is at the same time utterly averse to the idea of general publicity of private business methods and private business affairs. The States and the Federal Government can provide for investigations and full publicity of business methods, practices, and affairs generally by separate enactment, as has already been done to a measurable extent. Publicity at this stage, when business conditions and methods have become far more complicated and consistent of a far greater variety than those in existence during and following the Civil War period, would be resented by taxpayers to a correspondingly greater extent than it was during the operation of the Civil War acts. I strongly favor any and every kind of publicity needed with respect to all phases of our financial, commercial, and industrial activities, but I think it unwise in the light of almost universal experience in the past to discredit or break down the income-tax system or seriously jeopardize it by utilizing this law instead of some separate law or laws for publicity purposes.

I believe that I am correct in asserting that no Treasury Department officials for the last 25 years have advocated the publicity provision. The members of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee appointed in June 1933 to study and report upon methods of prevention of tax avoidance, made no recommendation, or even reference to the publicity of tax returns, nor did the report of the Ways and Means Committee of February 1934 contain any suggestion that the publicity of tax returns was an appropriate means of eliminating tax avoidance, though the amendment was offered to the committee and rejected. In commenting upon the proposal when the provision was being considered in the House on February 14, 1934, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said:

without pecuniary reward, can expect more than a precarious existence.

The Department, while in sympathy with the publicity feature, said that if it was thrown wide open, the fear was that shyster lawyers throughout the country would be down there in droves looking over individual returns and then going to the taxpayer and saying. "You have overpaid your tax. If you employ me, I can get you a refund of taxes." The committee thought it would be unwise to do that.

The direct evil of the publication of income-tax returns should in itself condemn it. We all know that in 1925 when returns were made subject to public inspection the information compiled therefrom was promiscuously bought, sold, and otherwise dealt in. Within 24 hours of the announcement that the tax lists would be open for inspection by the public the internal-revenue offices in various cities were beseiged with applicants from promoters, life-insurance salesmen, professional compilers of mailing lists, besides the usual inquisitive neighbors, curious competitors, and creditrating agencies. The nature of the applications is indication enough of the value of the lists to certain interests. One of the most serious and menacing aspects of this publicity plan is that it directs the pirates of finance specifically to those individuals who have money to invest. The belief of its authors was that publicity would uncover the tax dodger, but it seems safe to say that for every dollar the Government receives in additional revenue through information thus divulged, many more dollars of additional expense will be caused taxpayers through the interruption of the routine of revenue offices and the necessity for additional clerks to keep the public posted with tax information.

The wide protest that went up after the publication of the returns in 1925, following the enactment of the provision in 1924, caused its repeal in 1926. This was so with previous enactments. Statutes such as this which encroach upon the personal rights of the taxpayer have not long been countenanced and have heretofore been of short duration. I hope the same will be true of this one.

The Department of Justice, as well as municipal and State police forces all over the United States, are making a strenuous and very satisfying effort to combat crime. The Congress has enacted anticrime legislation to aid enforcement officers; and in the same session it deliberately played into the hands of blackmailers and kidnapers by opening the records of income-tax returns for their inspection. We also enacted a law proposing to provide safe securities for the investor, and forthwith passed another making the taxpayer, large and small, the target for unprincipled exploiters to prey upon. We assume that virtue is attached to all publicity, and we required that publicity be given to loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to banks. We all know the irreparable harm done to the American people by this requisite, but we do not learn by experience. The very mildest of our critics will call us inconsistent; the more forceful, brand us vicious. Certainly we show a lack of coordination.

Making income-tax returns public records has been tried before, and in each instance has failed. Public opinion will force its repeal sooner or later. It demands its repeal now. Why wait until the damage shall have been done? The large taxpayers are not evading their taxes illegally. Such a provision will not close the loopholes. Publicity of incometax returns is not going to help this situation. There is nothing in section 55 of the 1934 act to assure a true declaration of the taxable income.

The State of Wisconsin has such a provision. Of the 29 States that have some form of State income-tax law, only this one has included the publicity clause on its statute books. The tax commissioner in that State in his report on the provision in 1930 wrote "The expected results have not materialized. There have been no instances where public inspection has brought forth unreported income. A survey shows that public examination is almost wholly without any public motive or significance, but that advantage is taken to serve purely private or personal interests. Very frequent use is made of them in delving into the intimate concerns of business competitors. Those who pry into income-tax returns do not do so with the thought or attempt to find fraud or unreported incomes." Herein rests the rebellion of the American people. The provision is an invasion of private rights and it places business under a handi-cap, which it can afford at this time less than at any other in my recollection, by revealing its methods to the investigation of its rivals. The personal right to privacy is clearly violated and no good public end is served. The only argument brought forth in favor of the provision is a fallacy; in principal it is wrong; in practice it is unjust. I join with the taxpayers of the United States in demanding its repeal before March 15, 1935.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader what the program will be for the remainder of the week?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the minority leader that I expect to report out the annual Interior Department appropriation bill for 1936 tomorrow, and expect that will occupy the attention of the House during the remainder of this week.

Mr. SNELL. The consideration of that bill will continue for the remainder of the week?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I think it will take 3 days, and I hope to again adjourn over Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman does not expect to bring up the banking bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not intend to let anything interfere with the consideration of the Interior Department bill.

Mr. SNEIL. Several Members have asked me about the program for the remainder of the week.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, the Speaker has the right to change the procedure; but I do not think anything will interfere with the consideration of that bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 529. An act granting compensation to George S. Conway, Jr.;

H. R. 3982. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River between Rockport, Ind., and Owensboro, Ky.; and

H. R. 5701. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Indiana to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River at or near La Fayette, Ind.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 31. An act to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Chester C. Groff.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 27, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARING

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for the sacred privilege of tarrying at the seat of prayer. Here may we be blest with that spiritual discernment and faith by which we shall realize the sympathy and the soul-inspiring influences of God; we would patiently wait for the divine disclosure. Overrule our weak tendencies, our pride, and our selfishness which strive against the commonwealth of the soul. Forbid that we should permit anything to cloud and dull the visions of the spirit. Endue us with fortitude so we shall not allow any moral feebleness to mar or lower the standards of our conduct. We are thankful for the enjoyment of the lovely things of life; but inspire us with the ministry and the abiding issues of consecrated service. At this altar we are deeply saved because we have truly served. In the name of our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

MOBILE, ALA., February 20, 1935.

Hon. Joseph W. Byrns,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Speaker: I hereby tender my resignation as a Member of the Seventy-fourth Congress, to become effective March 2, 1935.

With assurance of my best wishes, I am, Yours very sincerely,

JOHN McDUFFIE.

THE LAWYER AND JUSTICE

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an article from the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News of December 30, 1934, by George B. Etheridge, one of the oldest associate justices of the supreme court, on the Lawyer and Justice.

I assure my colleagues that it has no political significance whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I want to say that the Members of the House have been very good in trying to keep newspaper articles from the RECORD. I just received a notice by the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing [Mr. FLETCHER] that they will be compelled to ask for an additional hundred thousand dollars for the Committee on Printing if we continue to place these things in the RECORD and increasing its size. hope the Membership will try their best to keep these matters out of the RECORD.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield? Has he called attention to the fact that the Senate is the worst violator of the rule?

Let me say to the gentleman that Senator FLETCHER and Senator Robinson are trying their best to hold them down, and I hope they will do so. Within the last few weeks it has not been so bad, although they are getting in too much now.

Mr. BOYLAN. The Members of the Senate are the offenders, not the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News of December 30, 1934, by George H. Ethridge, one of the oldest associate justices of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, on the Lawyer and Justice, as follows:

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News, Dec. 30, 1934] THE LAWYER AND JUSTICE

By George H. Ethridge, associate justice supreme court

The lawyer, when he is fully fitted for his duties as such, and when he uses his talents for the higher good of society, is one of which he uses his talents for the higher good of society, is one of the most important figures in civic life. He is a connecting link between the present and the past and should be the safest and most important guide for the future. The law as a science has come down to us from the remote past, changing with the habits and customs of the people, but, at all times, furnishing a guide for the best methods of regulating human affairs, as it has been in the efforts of its administrators made the most enlightened efforts to conform to actual justice and the rules for ascertaining what is justice and how the truth may most effectually be discovered and applied, to the affairs of men, advanced from crude ideas to a refined sense of practical justice. The lawyer who has mastered his profession and learned all the rules for the ascertainment of practical justice and studied their history—their successes and failures and the reasons for them—sees more clearly than others where ideality and practicality may be best blended to secure the most satisfactory justice that can be attained in human affairs. The lawyer is not naturally better or wiser than others in different avocations, but his studies and his practice in the courts give him a peculiar advantage in making and administering law.

No man can aptly make or enforce laws without having the learning that has come down to us from the past. This learning must with each generation be studied, modified, and applied to the practical affairs of everyday life. As people do not live now under exactly the same conditions that existed many years ago, running into the hundreds and perhaps thousands of years, it would be unjust to have them tied firmly and irrevocably to the rules that then existed. But the fundamental principles of justice do not vary much with the passing of the years. It is these principles that must be studied anew with each age and each generation, and modified where they operate unjustly in the practical affairs of men. Law is not an exact science. It is the best effort of man to reach perfection in dealing with each other. Men of one age may have erroneous ideas of what are the soundest principles of human conduct. If they by their pronouncements err in these principles, how far should society be bound by their judgments? That is a question that they are not to decide for all future generations, but is a question for each generation to decide for itself, in its own age, acting through its own tribunals. Rules which have served justice well should not be discarded without very grave reasons for so doing. The lawyer, by his daily study and reflection, can be of great service to his generation by applying his knowledge and experience to the problems as they arise, where change appears to be necessary. He should be able to bring to that task a mind well stored with the learning peculiar to the law and a refined sense of responsibility for the smooth course of justice. He should be aware of the dangers of needless changes and the dangers of perpetuating harm lying in erroneous decisions of statutes.

The law is composed of two great sources of authority and reason. One is thought of the problem and done. learning that has come down to us from the past. This learning must with each generation be studied, modified, and applied to erroneous decisions of statutes.

The law is composed of two great sources of authority and reason. One is the custom by which people have lived and done business for long periods of time, acting upon the common-sense justice of the great multitude. Their judgment must be given due weight in deciding every legal question that has not been recently considered and reviewed by the lawyer, both at the bar and on the bench. The lawyer on the bench needs the counsel and judgment of the lawyer at the bar, and the lawyer at the bar may be very helpful to the lawyer on the bench in deciding just what the law is, and if it has developed into injustice due to new conditions, just what changes may or should be made, and just who should make the necessary changes.

If the custom has existed for a long time "whereof the memory should make the necessary changes.

If the custom has existed for a long time "whereof the memory of living men runneth not to the contrary", then it is the law just as much as if it had been formally enacted by the legislature. A custom once established may change by a counter custom, and when it has existed for a like period it supplants the former custom or law. The judges of the courts must decide this question for the common knowledge of men who live in their age. The judge has no power to enact a law, and hence when he finds that the custom has existed for the prescribed time, he cannot change the law although he may believe it wrong in principle. It must be referred to the law-making department, known in most States as the legislature, and in the National Government as the Congress. The legislative body may make any change it considers necessary, whether it has been long-used custom or a previous statutory enactment. The courts must follow the law-making powers' decision and give effect to it unless it is repugnant to the State or Federal Constitutions. Whether it is too repugnant is a judicial question to be decided by the judge when some person or corporation affected by the statute affected brings a suit to have it declared void and set aside as having no legal force.

The Constitution is a paramount law, and no legislature has any

The Constitution is a paramount law, and no legislature has any power to set it aside, but they must, when necessary to enforce the Constitution, set aside an enactment of the legislative department. Constitution, set aside an enactment of the legislative department. The courts are not more powerful than the legislature, but the Constitution is. Someone must be the judge of whether a statute of the legislature infringes or violates a provision of the Constitution, but the courts can only act when a real lawsuit arises and the question is necessary to the disposition of the lawsuit. The lawyer here is a valued adviser of the court. There are usually one or more lawyers on each side giving the reasons for their positions and bringing into view any other court decision which has decided the question in other States having like constitutions and the reasons which influence his judgment. When each side has been fully heard and when the judges read the decisions and books upon the question, then they must render a decision. It is here where the lawyer may render his highest service to society. He is valuable question, then they must render a decision. It is here where the lawyer may render his highest service to society. He is valuable according to his ability, learning, and labor in the matter. In legislative bodies, when statutory changes are under consideration, the lawyers in that body should give fully of their time and counsel to the lawmakers. There are usually, if not always, competent lawyers who are members of that body to render such service. In order to determine such questions they should consider the old law and changes that are proposed in that law and the mischief that has resulted from the old law, and just what remedy is proposed and whether it is suitable or faulty. Often no change is really needed at all, but some member of the body, or other citizen, acting through the right of petition, may think there is need for a change. In such case the learning and experience of the lawyer are of great value. If he has made a study of the statute and the are of great value. If he has made a study of the statute and the court decisions construing it, he will often be able to greatly affect the minds of his colleagues in the legislature or the committee before them when he appears if he is not a member of the legislature. The lawyer and the lawmaker should have profound knowledge of the history and economics of the country and of as many other countries as it may be reasonable to expect of them.

THE LAWYER'S EDUCATION

These things being true, it is generally realized that a lawyer should have as full knowledge as he may acquire consistent with making his living and accumulating something during the years of vigorous life. He should have some knowledge before entering upon his professional career, and there is much diversity of opinion as to just what kind of education he should have as a condition when the professional career, and there is much diversity of opinion as to just what kind of education he should have as a condition. ion as to just what kind of education he should have as a condi-tion upon entering upon so important a field of activity. The law arises out of life and applies to the life that people live. It should not be expected that a great technical knowledge should be had before trying out the profession in practice. No newly made lawyer is going to be called upon to act in the most impor-tant affairs of life until he has proved his capacity to deal with the matter.

Usually there is a tolerably long period between the date of admission and the date of being called upon to act in the more important affairs of life. During this time the newly made lawyer should diligently apply his mind to the study of the law and its reasons and history. During this period of "watchful waiting" he will have much time for such study. When he gets a small case, or one involving a small amount, he will have something very practical to apply his mind to. It is a concrete proposition governed by legal principles. Just what principles should be applied he must learn and decide. It is the very best kind of education. The preliminary education need not be of the highest kind. It is not necessary that he should be a master of any kind of degree. His education need not at that period be beyond, or greatly beyond, that of the community he lives in and whose laws are presumably made for their needs and guidance. The main question is, Has he the necessary knowledge to understand the rules that govern that community and what the ideas and ideals of its people are? of its people are?

Justice for one class of people would not in every case be justice for another and different people. Their lawsuits arise out of their dealings and their understandings. They are not usually highly trained in the higher branches of learning, neither does a knowledge of those higher branches help much in solving their problems. and working out practical justice. The disposition of the average mind is to require too high a standard at the beginning and too little to be acquired in after life. The lawyer who does not follow up his studies after being admitted to the bar will not achieve much eminence no matter what his education was before he was admitted. His success will depend upon what he learns in the profession much more than it will upon what he had when he

But whatever standards may be required, they should depend upon what he actually knows and not where it was obtained. Much of the so-called "college education", and especially in standard colleges, consists of mere cultural education or polish, having but little to do with the practical things of life. For instance, much little to do with the practical things of life. For instance, much stress has been placed all along the line of learning in the different languages, both dead and living, as a requirement of a college education, and it has now drifted into the high schools. Ordinarily, the man or woman is going to spend the whole life in an English-speaking country and will have but little use for these other languages. Usually, when they have been out of college for a few years, they are wholly lost when it comes to speaking or reading these languages. They serve no useful purpose in the professional life, or, at least, the use is so small compared to the requirements of other knowledge as to make its value insignificant so far as practical efficiency is concerned. as practical efficiency is concerned.

TWELVE YEARS IN SCHOOL

The movement of standardization goes merrily on, and now it is required that a child, before he can be admitted to a standard college, must have spent 12 years of at least 8 months (usually 9) in the grammar and high-school courses. If he passes each grade every year, it will require 12 years; and if the child enters at 5 years, he will be 17 years of age before he is eligible for the college course. If he has the ability to finance a college course, he will be 21 before he can get out of the literary school. If he is still well fixed financially, he will then enter the professional school, and at the end of 4 years will take up the business and responsibility of professional life. But suppose the child is not thus fortunately situated, but must earn the money wherewith to acquire these higher branches, how will he then fare? He will, we will say, finish the grammar grades by the time he is 21 years old (and where a child has to do a part of the family work, and earn a part of the family income, it will be fortunate if it can at this age begin the acquirement of the high school and college and professional education). If he is fortunate enough to earn enough to save in 1 year the expense of a year in school, he will begin with the high-school branches. By working 1 year and going to school another, he will acquire a high-school education at 28 years of age. It will then be necessary to begin on the college course, and he will be fortunate if he can make enough in 1 year to go to school 1 year. It will then take 8 more years of combined The movement of standardization goes merrily on, and now it work and study to get out of college. He will then be 36 years of age; and if he wants to enter one of these professions he will again be fortunate if he can make enough in 1 year to pay school expenses 1 year, and as it will require 4 years of professional education to meet these standards, he will be 44 years old when he penses I year, and as it will require 4 years of professional education to meet these standards, he will be 44 years old when he begins professional work.

The investment of both time and money is, therefore, too heavy to expect that such a person will undertake the arduous task. He will necessarily abandon all ambition along that line and will become, to a certain extent, rebellious against a government that denies him the opportunity of entering these learned and "genteel" professions and occupations. Let us then see about the child that is able to finish the high school during its minority, but has no means of procuring an education in an accredited institution until by its labor it has earned and saved the necessary amount. It will then take on the same basis 8 years to get the college education, but then it has the ambition to enter a profession and this, if the standards are so raised, will require 8 more years, which will enable the child (?) to enter the profession at the age of 36 years. Will such people strive to enter the professions and "genteel occupations" at such a cost of time and money? If not, the country must give up its ideals and lose some of the best talent that has heretofore adorned these occupations. There will be no more Benjamin Franklins, Patrick Henrys, John Marshalls, Andrew Jacksons, Henry Clays, Abraham Lincolns, Andrew Johnsons, or James A. Garfields, each of whom rendered the most distinguished service.

EMINENT SELF-MADE LAWYERS

Patrick Henry, the great agitator, who inspired the love of liberty and fomented resistance to English tyranny and sponsored the great Revolutionary War that gave us our liberties and made us great Revolutionary War that gave us our liberties and made us the greatest nation of liberty in the world, a country in which the rights and liberties of the whole people, plebian and patrician, noble and common, lay and clergy, are equally secured, and each may follow the destination that brain and ambition carve out for him in the great activities of life—Patrick Henry, more than any other one man, brought this about; and yet he had no diploma in "an accredited college." Then there was John Marshall, the greatest judge that ever sat in a seat of human justice, and whose wisdom and foresight is the wonder of the world. By common wisdom and foresight is the wonder of the world. By common consent he tops the world as a lawyer and judge, and yet he had no diploma in an accredited college. Then there is "Old Hickory"—soldier, statesman, and patriot combined—who whipped the British at New Orleans, and "King" Biddle and the bank at Wash-British at New Orleans, and "King" Biddle and the bank at Washington, and who today shares equal honors with the great apostle of liberty, Thomas Jefferson, as a patron saint of democracy. He had but little learning in the books, but he had a profound common sense and a great practical wisdom and was the peer of any man of his time, not even excluding Henry Clay, who was himself an unlearned man so far as having had a course of study in an accredited college. Neither of these men—giants though they were in intellect and influence—had a degree in any college of any kind. Then there was honest Abe Lincoln, whose name and memory are enshrined in the hearts of the Nation and of the world, who takes a seat in the summit of fame with Washington himself. who takes a seat in the summit of fame with Washington himself. And yet he was uneducated so far as accredited colleges were concerned.

There are thousands of others of somewhat less eminence, but who have adorned all callings and professions and won their mark in the various walks of life in which they cast their shadows, oft towering above the graduate of the accredited college of their day and generation.

This country has grown and prospered wonderfully under the theory of equality of right and opportunity for all the people, regardless of rank, wealth, or ancestry. We have more useful inventions than any other country, although our civilization was considered, at the time of the Revolution, as inferior to that of the greater nations of Europe. In all walks of life the child of poverty has struggled up to the great heights of success and fame in competition with the children of families who boasted of ancestry and college diplomes for several generations. It is a clorious recpetition with the children of families who boasted of ancestry and college diplomas for several generations. It is a glorious record, and the only one where opportunity was open to the unfortunate and poor. Shall we cast such glory into the discard and the rubbish heap and close the doors of opportunity in the face of the unfortunate and the poor? I hope not; yet we are doing this very thing, and by so doing we are sowing the dragon's teeth of hate that will, in the future, surely grow a harvest of blood.

REQUIREMENTS OF LAWYER

At the present time in this State our laws prescribe a high-school education, or its equivalent, to practice law in the courts of the State, in addition to requiring an examination in 12 subjects of the law. All of the associated schools have in mind reising this requirement to a full 4-year college course before taking the law course, and a full 4-year law course on top of that. Does the young lawyer need a college education to make a success in the study and practice of the law? I think not.

I have observed many successful lawyers who did not have even the equivalent of the present day high-school course. Many others had no more. Many of them never went to a law school and then won over competitors who had all the advantages that accredited colleges can give. I do not mean to depreciate the value of college education to a lawyer. It certainly is an advantage. But it is not a sine qua non. A young man who has the equivalent of a high-school education knows enough to master the law if he is studious and has the wisdom known as "common sense." There are law lexicons and English lexicons wherein he may master the meaning of words, and with these mastered, he may understand the most tedious and technical law book printed in English, and in this day and country, all that are worth reading are printed in the English language. It has become the habit of legal writers and law-book publishers to put their books in good, plain English, avoiding much of what, in the former years, were latinized words, phrases, and maxims. The law is not so difficult to learn when one tries earnestly. The chief difficulty is the vast amount of things and conditions which the law deals with, the multitudinous volumes of cases and precedents with which he must deal. It is the variety and vastness of the application of the law to facts and conditions. This requires diligence rather than occult learning to the master. The law is a science, but not a perfect one, and it is not the greater difficulty to understand its nomenclature, but rather the untiring application of common sense to concrete facts and conditions. There is no just reason for shutting the doors of this field in the face of the ambitious young man who is willing to spend his evening hours around the lamp rather than chasing the fleeting hours of evening with flying feet to the caprictous pleasing of a flute, violin, or an orchestra.

The bar (or the practice of law) has long been regarded as a highway to emispance and he who understands the things.

The bar (or the practice of law) has long been regarded as a highway to eminence, and he who understands the things that the successful practicing lawyer must learn over a period of years will better understand how to deal with them. No man or woman can be a real statesman without protracted study of the laws and conditions of this country. Every business man may, at times, need the services of a lawyer, not always a profound one or a high-priced one, but a lawyer, nevertheless. The small-town lawyer is still a necessity, and will likely always be, to the welfare and prosperity of the country.

CORRECTING OCCUPATIONAL ERRORS

A reason of great influence that should not be ignored in considering what standards of education are to be required to enter any profession is the possibility of error in selecting that line of work for a life task. Often the youth and the student do not know just what line of work they will like nor what they may succeed in. Often one enters business life under a wrong impression of the business they have selected, and with wrong ideas about their capacity for that line of work. It is highly important that these mistakes be corrected and suitable avocation found before committing all the energies and resources of life into it. If every young person had a matured and experienced mind and knew the details of every line of business, then it might be that we could reasonably require the person to be well-trained for that particular task before undertaking it, especially where it has a quasipublic interest. That is to say, if it be one that necessarily affects the public in a material way.

We must remember that young men and young ladies who have

We must remember that young men and young ladies who have no experience in any line of business, and who know next to nothing of its requirements, of its emoluments, and consequently are not qualified to judge of what it is nor of their capacity to taste for it—we should keep it possible for such to correct their errors in making a selection for a business. A parent is often but little better qualified than his son or daughter where they desire to enter a business that the parent has not followed—and they generally do want to get into a different line. It is true that a majority actually follow the occupation of their parents if they have the means to do so. But that sometimes is a matter of practical necessity for the lack of knowledge and financial ability to go into something else. The jobs which we do not have generally look more desirable than the one we do have. No person can be happy in life if he is engaged in a business or calling that is not agreeable to him. He cannot be successful in any eminent degree. He should have the right without undue sacrifice of making a change. If the time and money spent is very great in qualifying for it, he feels that he must stick to it regardless of his capacity to be happy or fill it with credit. This ought not to be so.

ADDITIONAL CLERK HIRE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a unanimous-consent request. Mr. Speaker, I am today reporting from the Committee on Accounts H. R. 6028, to provide for additional clerk hire in the House of Representatives, and for other purposes.

This will come to the House from this Committee on Accounts without any recommendation whatever. It is my purpose when it is discussed to present my views in opposition to this measure. It is not a privileged bill. I am therefore asking unanimous consent that this bill may be treated as a privileged bill coming from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, I understand that will permit the gentleman to have absolute control of the time, and he can use an hour. I want to ask the gentleman if, in addition to his own statement, he is going to permit those opposed to the measure to have at least half the time?

Mr. WARREN. I happen to be one of those opposed to the measure, and, of course, I shall divide the time equally.

Mr. TABER. I should like to know also if the gentleman would agree that the resolution shall not be called up until after the Interior Department bill is disposed of?

Mr. WARREN. It could not be called up today if consent was given. It was my purpose, if it is satisfactory to the Speaker, to call it up next Monday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. TABER. I think we ought to know when it is to be called up. I would not object to the consideration of the resolution under the circumstances and the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Is not this a rather unusual procedure, for the Committee on Accounts to offer to the House a resolution that it does not endorse? Has that thing been done in late years?

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is unusual. I understand it has been done in the past, but just now I do not recall the case.

Mr. SNELL. I do not remember such an occasion, but it might have happened.

Mr. WARREN. I know the propriety about keeping the committee proceedings inviolate, and I hope I am not transgressing on that when I say that this whole subject has been very carefully considered by the committee in the different phases of it. The committee on one occasion voted unanimously against a session clerk. It is my opinion—and I hope I am not transgressing the rules to say it—that this would have been unfavorably acted upon yesterday except for the feeling that we think that as this peculiarly affects the privileges of the Members of the House, we were willing to have them vote upon it.

Mr. SNELL. As I am not a member of the committee, I cannot transgress any rules along that line, but it is currently reported that this comes from the Committee on Accounts because the Democratic steering committee insisted on having it brought out. I do not ask the gentleman to reply to that statement. It is currently so reported.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman is at liberty to ask that, and also to get a reply. It is quite true that a committee from the Democratic steering committee asked that this be reported out. Of course, I have great respect for the Democratic steering committee, but it certainly did not actuate me in any way, nor does it keep me from vigorously opposing this, if it comes up for a vote.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to say that the committee on one occasion voted unanimously against it.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, the gentleman misunderstood me. I stated that the committee voted unanimously against a session clerk—another resolution. On that the committee was unanimous. They were not unanimous on this.

Mr. SNELL. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. Why is it necessary to make it a privileged matter, if the gentleman just needs unanimous consent to consider it.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, I think the committee ought to have control of the debate, if it comes up.

Mr. SNELL. I suggest that it is not necessary to make it a privileged resolution but simply to ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House on next Monday.

Mr. WARREN. That gives the committee the right to demand the previous question after an hour.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, I don't think I have any objection to that, if that is all the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. As I understand the request of the gentleman, it is to give the resolution a privileged status so that it can be called up and considered in the Committee of the Whole as other privileged bills, but the gentleman is asking that the resolution be considered as a privileged resolution, which will give him the right to call it up as he sees fit, the same as if it were a privileged resolution reported by his committee. Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. That it be treated as any other privileged resolution coming from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MAPES. That will limit the discussion of it to 1 hour. and give the control of the debate to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. And no amendments would be in order?

Mr. WARREN. I would not say that.

Mr. MAPES. They would not be unless the gentleman yielded for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct. I would not say 3 days ahead of its consideration, without any amendment being submitted to me, that I would not permit an amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Inasmuch as the gentleman is opposed to the resolution. I shall not object to his request.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Do I understand that the committee is opposed to the resolution?

Mr. WARREN. I did not say that.

Mr. RICH. Is a majority of the committee opposed to the resolution?

Mr. WARREN. That is my opinion.

Mr. RICH. If the majority of the committee is opposed to the resolution, then it is brought up because of the fact that they want the Membership of the House to determine whether they want to add another clerk to the pay roll during the session of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. It seems to me if the Members of Congress and their clerks would spend a little more time in their offices, probably we could eliminate that expense.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the gentleman can state his views when the resolution comes up for consideration.

Mr. RICH. Then we will come here to debate on this, and the Membership of the House will probably, if they see fit, carry it into effect, and add just so much additional burden to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. WARREN. It is to cost $440,000 a year.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. RICH. I reserve the objection.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the gentleman most earnestly not to object. I have stated to the gentleman that I am very much opposed to this and will so express myself at the proper time; but I think it ought to be considered and the Members of the House ought to have the right to vote on it, and I hope, furthermore, that we may have a roll-call vote upon the matter.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman do everything in his power to see that we get a roll call?

Mr. WARREN. Of course.

Mr. RICH. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The question I had in mind to submit to the gentleman from North Carolina has already been answered, and that is, if the consent be given, would he assist in helping to get a record vote on the resolution?

Mr. WARREN. I certainly shall ask for one.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] that H. R. 6028 be given a privileged status, to be considered as other reports from the Committee on Accounts in the House?

There was no objection.

CONTINUATION IN OFFICE OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit another unanimous-consent request.

House Joint Resolution 189, introduced by the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, relates to the continuance on the pay roll of certain employees in cases of death or resignation of Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts. It is not a privileged resolution.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that this resolution be made a privileged resolution coming from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, as I understand, House Joint Resolution 189 calls for continuation on the pay roll for 6 months of secretaries of Members who die?

Mr. WARREN. Not to exceed 6 months.

Mr. RICH. Why should we keep on the pay roll secretaries of Members who die?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I introduced this resolution. The matter was called to my attention upon the death of one of our Members recently, the distinguished and beloved Member from New York, Mr. Griffin. Under the law the secretary is only continued for 30 days. In addition to that, immediately upon the death of a Member all franking privileges are cut off. Unless a Member is reelected from that district within a few months that district has no representation or clearing place for its interests. After 30 days the secretary is off the pay roll and must move out of the office. This resolution is not original with me. It has been suggested for years.

It is my idea, however, that the district should be represented here for sometime at least, not to exceed 6 months. If a new Member is elected in the meantime, as will probably happen in the New York district, then the secretary is only continued for 2 or 3 months, or until the new Member is

Mr. RICH. That provision is in the bill, is it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is in the bill. The extension of service is not to exceed 6 months, or until a new Member is elected.

Mr. SNELL. Would this secretary have the franking privilege and all other privileges that go to a Member?

Mr. O'CONNOR. This resolution does not take care of the franking privilege. That is another matter that I submit might be taken care of. For instance, when a Member dies the secretary on that date cannot even send a telegram. I have permitted them sometimes to use my frank, although it may be a violation of the strict rules of the House. The franking privilege, to some extent, might well be another matter to be continued for some time after the death of a

Mr. SNELL. Is an office furnished and various other perquisites that go to all Members?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Some office must, of course, be furnished, but the secretary, under this resolution, comes under the direction of the Clerk of the House, who can dismiss the secretary if the Clerk thinks he or she is inefficient or not working in accordance with the regular duties of a secretary to a Member.

Mr. SNELL. If I remember correctly, and I am not absolutely certain about it, that matter was brought before the House, and whether it was objected to or turned down by a vote of the House, I am not sure, but I think that at the time of the death of Mr. Browning, of New Jersey, this same proposition was brought before the House and it was turned down.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am informed that the matter has never come before the House.

Mr. SNELL. It may have been objected to when it came up for unanimous consent, but this is a pretty far-reaching proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not think so. I think the resolution corrects a situation that has existed for some time. I do not believe a district should be absolutely unrepresented for 6 months.

Mr. SNELL. The Governor can call an election, if he wants one, within 30 days.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the election cannot possibly be held within 30 days from the time of the death.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman knows a secretary cannot represent a district, when it comes right down to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. He or she certainly can take care of the requests from a district and maintain the files pertaining to the district.

Mr. SNELL. Then the language must be changed, giving the secretary the power of representing the district, giving him the franking privilege and an office, and all these other things. Now, it is a pretty far-reaching proposition you are asking for at the present time.

Mr. RICH. I would remind the gentleman from New York that it might happen, as, for instance, is the case in the State of New York at the present time, that a State would have two delegates at large who do not have any particular district to attend to. One of these delegates at large might be requested to take over the office of a dead member from that State until its affairs were closed up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution No. 189 be given a privileged status to be considered as other reports from the Committee on Accounts.

Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLICATION OF WRITINGS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution No. 140, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out all after "Sec. 2" down to and including "to" in line 5 and insert: "The former Director of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, without receiving any compensation therefor, shall."

Page 2, lines 18 and 19, strike out "for personnel authorized by this section."

this section,".

Pages 2 and 3, strike out all of section 3 and insert:
"Sec. 3. For personal services, including services rendered since December 31, 1934, travel and necessary miscellaneous expenses, in connection with the purposes of this joint resolution, there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $35,000."

Page 3, lines 6 and 7, strike out "Obligations authorized to be incurred and payments authorized to be made" and insert "Payments authorized" ments authorized."

Page 3, line 8, strike out "paid" and insert "made."
Page 3, line 9, strike out all after "Department" down to and including "Director" in line 10.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is any objection, but I think the changes should be explained.

Mr. KELLER. I shall be pleased to. The Senate amendments merely make the bill conform with the rules of the accounting department. This resolution passed the House on the 6th day of the month.

Mr. SNELL. What are the changes?

Mr. KELLER. Take section 3, for instance:

For personal services, including services rendered since December 31, 1934, travel and necessary miscellaneous expenses, in connection with the purposes of this joint resolution, there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $35,000.

Mr. SNELL. Just what is the difference between the Senate amendment and the language of the section as it passed the House?

This appropriates a definite and specific Mr. KELLER. amount, and limits the amount to $35,000.

Mr. SNELL. Was the other resolution limited to $35,000?

Mr. BLOOM. It turns back into the Treasury the money in the hands of the Commission, so that past accounts are closed up. It appropriates $35,000 for the next 2 years to take care of the salaries of the historian and other employees. The money on hand goes back into the Treasury. This is a direct appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. Does it change the amount at all?

Mr. BLOOM. No; the amount is practically the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON UNAMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein a radio address broadcast last evening by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address delivered over the radio last evening by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], as follows:

On the 17th of February Gen. Smedley Butler saw fit to employ this radio network to indulge in general criticism of the work done by the congressional committee on un-American activities and to cast aspersions on the character of such men as Alfred E. Smith, Louis Howe, General MacArthur, and Hanford McNider. I would not be true to my oath of office as a Congressman nor to my responsibility as a public official if I let these uncontrolled statements go unchallenged.

Since it is necessary for me to offer an apology to the American my responsibility as a public official if I let these uncontrolled statements go unchallenged.

Since it is necessary for me to offer an apology to the American people for General Butler regarding the latitude he has taken about his utterances before our committee, I desire to state that General Butler not only came to the committee but also gave the statement to the newspapers in advance of his appearance before the committee. He deliberately issued a statement to the press outlining in great detail as to what he was going to testify, although his actual testimony did not in many respects bear out his statement to the newspapers. Before General Butler finished his testimony before the committee the early edition of the November 20, 1934, issue of one New York paper carried a copyrighted statement by him which I am sure was not ethical on his part.

The committee felt it should hear General Butler and to follow out the leads which the General furnished to the members of the committee. The testimony given by General Butler was kept confidential until such time as the names of the persons who were mentioned in his testimony could be checked upon and verified. The committee did not want to hear General Butler's allegations without giving itself the opportunity to verify the assertions made by him. It did not feel like dragging into the mud of publicity names of persons who were mentioned by General Butler unless his statements could be verified, since untold damage might be caused to a person's reputation by public discussion of testimony which could not be substantiated. This accounts for the fact that when the results of the hearing were finally made public, references to Alfred E. Smith and others were omitted. They were wholly without consequence and public mention might be misinterpreted by the public. The essential portions, however, of General Butler's testimony have been released to the public and his specific by the public. The essential portions, however, of General But-ler's testimony have been released to the public and his specific charges relating to the proposed organization of a soldier's move-ment have been thoroughly aired and passed upon by the com-

"Of course, I told the leaders of this Fascist movement that I was not interested in fascism or in any other 'ism.'"

But over this network he said:

"As a matter of fact, it wasn't a Fascist movement at all, except certain newspapers and the committee itself so termed it."

General Butler's outbreak is much less intelligible when a glance is taken at the official report of the committee, in which due and complete reference is made to Butler as well as all the facts brought out by him. Let me read from the report of the committee: committee:

"This committee received evidence from Maj. Gen. Smedley D. Butler (retired), twice decorated by the Congress of the United States. He testified before the committee as to conversations with one Gerald C. MacGuire, in which the latter is alleged to have suggested the formation of a Fascist army under the leadership of suggested the formation of a Fascist army under the leadership of General Butler.

"MacGuire denied these allegations under oath, but your committee was able to verify all the pertinent statements made by General Butler, with the exception of the direct statement suggesting the creation of the organization. This, however, was corroborated in the correspondence of MacGuire with his principal, Robert Sterling Clark, of New York City, while MacGuire was abroad studying the various forms of veterans' organizations of Fascist character."

"The following is an except from one of MacGuire's letters:

"The following is an excerpt from one of MacGuire's letters:
"I had a very interesting talk last evening with a man who is quite well up on affairs here, and he seems to be of the opinion that the Croix de Feu will be very patriotic during this crisis and will take the cuts or be the moving spirit in the veterans to accept the cuts. Therefore they will, in all probability, be in opposition to the Socialists and functionaires. The general spirit among the functionaires seems to be that the correct way to regain recovery is to spend more money and increase ways, rather than to put functionaires seems to be that the correct way to regain recovery is to spend more money and increase wages, rather than to put more people out of work and cut salaries.

"'The Croix de Feu is getting a great number of new recruits, and I recently attended a meeting of this organization and was quite impressed with the type of men belonging. These fellows are interested only in the salvation of France, and I feel sure that the country could not be in better hands because they are not politicians; they are a cross section of the best people of the country from all walks of life, people who gave their all between 1914 and 1918 that France might be saved; and I feel sure that if a crucial test ever comes to the Republic that these men will be the bulwark upon which France will be saved.

"'There may be more uprisings; there may be more difficulties; but, as is evidenced right now, when the emergency arises party lines and party difficulties are forgotten as far as France is concerned and all become united in the one desire and purpose to keep this country of the greatest freedom on the European continent.'

"This committee asserts that any efforts based on these lines

"This committee asserts that any efforts based on these lines as suggested in the foregoing, and leading off to the extreme right, are just as bad as efforts would lead to the extreme left."

This ends the quotation from the report. In the face of this report Butler cannot honestly assert that the committee did not properly go into the questions raised by him. General Butler says that the movement that he was discussing was not to be a Fascist movement but a sort of a soldiers' movement. If that is so, the facts brought out by him were given full publicity and the American public was acquainted with every substance concerning it.

Now, let us see what the charges are against Alfred E. Smith, General MacArthur, Hanford McNider, and Louis Howe. Not even up to this minute has General Butler made any specific charges against these men. What have they done? The committee finds that they have done nothing except for the fact that General Butler has mentioned their names in his testimony.

Butler has mentioned their names in his testimony.

Butler says that Louis Howe did not want to have him invited to the Chicago convention of the American Legion. He does not say that Howe told him that, but he states that MacGuire, who was the chairman of the distinguished guest committee of the American Legion, asked Louis Johnson, the then commander of the Legion, to place General Butler's name on the list of invited guests, but that Johnson had taken this list for approval of the White House and was told by Mr. Howe, the President's Secretary. guests, but that Johnson had taken this list for approval of the White House and was told by Mr. Howe, the President's Secretary, that Butler's name should be crossed off, because the President did not want him. Remember, this is not testimony given by Butler as to what Howe told him, but it is testimony given by Butler to the effect that somebody told somebody else that Howe did not wish him invited to the convention. Is this the kind of testimony which should subject the Secretary to the President to be called upon to make an answer before the committee? Testimony which everybody understands is pure hearsay and which is of absolutely no importance to anyone does not require the Secretary to the President to be subjected to any questioning.

Let us see how Alfred E. Smith's name is mentioned in the testiof absolutely no importance to anyone does not require the Secretary to the President to be subjected to any questioning.

Let us see how Alfred E. Smith's name is mentioned in the testimony—and, mind you, there is no charge of any kind which would call upon anybody to investigate; simply the throwing out of a name which may just as well be omitted for whatever good it may do. All the general had to say about Alfred E. Smith was that at the dinner to be given by the Governor of Massachusetts in honor of General Butler he was to have his picture taken with Governor Smith, at which General Butler stated that he did not like Alfred E. Smith. If this statement is a charge which requires an investigation, I cannot for the life of me see where any charge is made or intended simply because Governor Smith's name was just thrown out by General Butler. And so it goes with all the other prominent names which General Butler complains should have been investigated. No charge is made that these individuals were in any kind of a plot to overthrow the American Government or to sponsor any anti-American movement. Oh, no; just because General Butler sees fit to mention the names of certain people, he immediately insists that mentioning their names is a charge which the committee should investigate. The committee would become a laughing stock of the world if it were to go into the question of examining prominent citizens simply because some-body casually mentions their names.

The committee takes full responsibility for not paying any attention to this type of testimony. It could not be permitted to go out to the public. It would only result in needless subjection of prominent men to unsavory criticism.

This is the sum and substance of the charges which General go out to the public. It would only result in needless subjection of prominent men to unsavory criticism.

This is the sum and substance of the charges which General Butler says should have been investigated by the committee.

General Butler's anger is wholly unexplained, and I do not believe that the general, if permitted to reflect, would repeat his so-called "charges." None are substantiated, and they are so filmsy that it is hard to believe that a person of General Butler's standing in the community would indulge in such promiscuous accusations. However, should the committee's power be extended it may be that the general will receive one of the first subpenas to further appear before the committee.

General Butler asks why Clark was not called before the committee. Well, the reason was that Mr. Clark has been living in France for over a year, as General Butler well knows, and naturally he could not be subpenaed, but on the 29th of December 1934, Mr. Clark was represented before the committee in the person of his attorney, and full information was given the committee. Mr. Butler did not tell you this.

I believe the American people are intelligent enough to understand that a committee of the type which Congress created to investigate subversive movements with limited time at its disposal, and which sought to achieve the one aim, and that is to put an end to any treasonable un-American activities, should not have its time occupied by going into baseless accusations and investigating something which calls for no investigation at all. We do not believe that the mention of any name in the inquiry which is absolutely irrelevant to the subject matter and of no consequence to the work of the committee as a whole should be dragged into a public discussion for no purpose whatsoever. The committee had to attend to its business intelligently and will not permit its forum to be used for the airing of silly grievances or discussions of investment places. of imaginary plots.

THE WORK RELIEF BILL

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radiobroadcast I made last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address delivered by me on invitation by the National Broadcasting Co., on a Nation-wide hook-up, on February 26, 1935. I appeared on the regular feature program entitled "Congress Speaks", presented to the Nation every week from the House wing of the Capitol by the National Broadcasting Co.

The radio address follows:

Good evening, my fellow Americans. Speaking to you at this hour on this pertinent feature program of the National Broadcasting Co. after a week so momentous in the Nation's history that it has brought the far-reaching decision of the Supreme Court on the gold clauses, after a week that has sent the largest appropria-tion measure of all time back to the Senate committee for redraftand after a week that has been outstanding for the outspoken opposition from numerous quarters on several new-deal measures pending in Congress, I come to you through this medium as an humble champion of the great man in the White House, President Franklin D. Roosevelt. I sincerely believe that everything he has done and everything he has proposed was prosecuted with the one aim in mind of trying to bring the country back to normalcy. I will go further than that and make the statement that the great majority of the 6.000 bills that have been introduced in the House. majority of the 6,000 bills that have been introduced in the House and the 2,000 that have been introduced in the Senate during this and the 2,000 that have been introduced in the Senate during this session of the Seventy-fourth Congress were drafted by their authors with a sincere view of helping to end the depression. They were introduced as a contribution to the restoration of confidence. They are a part of the great revitalizing process so ably prosecuted by President Roosevelt to restore this Nation, to rout poverty, to stabilize agricultural products, to solve the monetary problems, and to accomplish many other purposes definitely antidepression. Down to date the present administration is receiving the well-deserved applause of the majority of our people for its major activities. There have been mistakes, yes. But we are confronted by the time-proven principle that any administration or any man may sometimes err. We are heartened by the fact that the Roosevelt administration has demonstrated a policy of correcting the mistakes it has made when they became apparent. There is no doubt that there are improvements yet to be made. No one questions the fact that there is yet remedial legislation to be enacted. Realizing that the accomplishments down to date have been Realizing that the accomplishments down to date have been made under the direct leadership and by the forethought of Franklin D. Roosevelt, it is well to consider here our progress under his banner since March 4, 1933. We have emerged from the depths of the most terrible depression the American people have ever known. Our domestic trade has been awakened, our foreign commerce has considerably improved, smoke replaces cobwebs in our principal factories, the glow from the miner's headlamp is once more apparent, and our unemployment has actually decreased through governmental and private enterprise. Recently President Roosevelt flung far and wide the challenge to the American people to take stock of themselves. Our great President requested us all, individually, to ask ourselves the question, "Am I better off than I was in March 1933?" This bold, fearless challenge was pointed to by Republicans and other antiadministrationists as a positive boomerang to the new deal. Like many other cherished hopes of the opposition, this predicted boomerang failed to materialize. The die-hards and soreheads have failed utterly to reckon with the Roosevelt policy, the Roosevelt popularity, the Roosevelt frankness, Realizing that the accomplishments down to date have been Roosevelt policy, the Roosevelt popularity, the Roosevelt frankness, and above all the Roosevelt strategy. Apparently the great masses of the American people have accepted the challenge of the President, for the anti-Roosevelt forces have quit talking about the

Paradoxical as it may sound, the obstructionists have "risen above principle" and are now playing in the manner of a beast with human misery. The obstructionists have followed a self-designed strategy of attaching this and that amendment to the works-relief program until it has been shamefully retarded. It is felt here, however, that the works-relief program will not remain waterlogged for long. Contained in this proposal is the future of many successful agencies of the Roosevelt new deal. The greatest, perhaps, is the huge public-works program, one of the most satisfactory of the present administration. It has reached into every State in the Union. It is founded on a permanent basis. It is a creative work that will remain a serviceable monument to the thoughtfulness of this era. It is predicated upon construction, the erection of important buildings, the development of needed facilities such as water works, gas plants, ice plants, public markets, drainage projects, school buildings, libraries, power distributing plants, dormitories, swimming pools, sewers, and sewage-disposal plants, courthouses, toll bridges, auditoriums and gymnasiums, plants, courthouses, toll bridges, auditoriums and gymnasiums, reservoirs, and numerous other projects of permanent value to the Nation. Who will say that it is not important that this work be carried forward? Who will acquiesce in unreasonable delay in acting on the works-relief program? Almost every important agency of the new deal is affected by this proposal. The public-works program has been mentioned. There is also the Civilian Conservation Corps, probably the most successful part from a standpoint of popularity of the Roosevelt administration. In the Civilian Conservation Corps is the program of soil erosion, the good effects of which are felt universally.

In Oklahoma, the Stafe which it is my pleasure to represent civilian Conservation Corps is the program of soil erosion, the good effects of which are felt universally.

In Oklahoma, the State which it is my pleasure to represent at large in the House of Representatives, the soil-erosion work is under the capable direction of Dr. N. E. Winters, connected with the agricultural college at Stillwater, Okla. As an example of the importance of this work, using the State of Oklahoma for an example, Dr. Winters, after scientific investigation, has made startling discoveries of the erosion of Oklahoma farms. Alarming indeed is information from Dr. Winters that 85 percent of the cultivated land of Oklahoma suffers serious soil losses, that more than 2,000,000 acres of Oklahoma land have no top soil; that more than 440,000,000 tons of soil are annually washed from fields and pastures of Oklahoma; and that a fleet of 4,200 motor trucks of 4,000-pound capacity, loading and unloading every 10 minutes, working day and night throughout the year, could barely haul away this tremendous volume of soil. Oklahoma is not without parallel in this soil-erosion problem. Contained in the waterlogged works-relief measure is the future of the soil-erosion program so effectively initiated by President Roosevelt. Contained in the works-relief measure is the great conservation program, more popularly known as the C. C. C. Will anyone deny that this important work should be speeded forward without delay? Are there those who are foolhardy enough to say that the American people do not want this program? Will any self-styled leader of the obstructionists be careless enough to say that these newdeal agencies have been unsuccessful?

We come now to another major program of the Roosevelt administration that will undoubtedly be affected by the delay of deal agencies have been unsuccessful?

We come now to another major program of the Roosevelt administration that will undoubtedly be affected by the delay of the works-relief measure. It involves Federal aid to education. The present administration has come nearer to recognizing that education is a Federal as well as a State problem than any preceding administration. It has followed a policy of extending Federal aid to every school district in the Nation below 5,000 population when it became definitely established that the district had used every possible local, county, and State resource and yet was faced with closing. Weak schools over the Nation have been kept open by the present Roosevelt administration. Teachers—who are open by the present Roosevelt administration. Teachers—who are at best poorly paid—have been able to receive salaries that otherwise would not have been available had not the Federal Government come to the rescue. The continuance of this policy is indefinite until action is obtained on the works-relief bill. Who would dare oppose this feature of the program, when the education of the school children of the entire Nation is at stake? Who would would dare oppose this feature of the program, when the education of the school children of the entire Nation is at stake? Who would have the fortitude to face an aroused and militant constituency of school teachers who have worked without pay? Who could withstand the telling logic of parents who proclaim that their children shall not be denied the opportunity of an elementary education? He who would oppose the works-relief bill must give consideration to this matter. Having spent 15 years teaching school in my home State of Oklahoma before coming to Congress, I have been vitally interested in everything affecting education. I am proud that I have had a part in securing almost $2,000,000 of Federal money for the aid of education in Oklahoma to the present date. Federal aid kept schools from closing last year, and we want to keep our schools open for the present term. Again I say that Oklahoma is not without parallel. The condition is analogous in other States. Public sentiment will demand that this phase of the Roosevelt program be not only continued but that it be expanded. Public sentiment will go so far in time that a permanent program of Federal support for education will be adopted.

We come now to perhaps the most pressing phase of the work-relief bill, that of direct relief. President Roosevelt has reiterated time and again that no one shall starve. The helpless and the weak have been depending on Congress to carry forward the President's wishes and provide sustenance and shelter to the pitiable victims of the ravaging depression. I submit to you that we cannot procrastinate with human misery. We cannot afford to tantalize our fellow beings in poverty and want who have so lately approved the program of President Roosevelt. We must accept the mandate thrown down from the highest tribunal last November, which so definitely expressed approval of the present administration. President Roosevelt and his new-deal program were running on every ballot in every State in the Union last were running on every ballot in every State in the Union last November. The people overwhelmingly approved both. The ballot box last November said that the Federal Government must con-tinue in the role of being "our brother's keeper." It, in effect, said that the States and local communities are unable to comsaid that the States and local communities are unable to completely carry the relief load. The ballot box said the people are already overburdened with ad valorem taxes. It said the people are already overtaxed on the tangible things. It approved in no uncertain terms the action of the Federal Government, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, in assuming the relief and so-called "charity" burdens until the various new-deal agencies alleviate poverty and distress. In the face of these circumstances it is impossible that a majority party can fail to take immediate action on the work-relief bill now pending in Congress.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered on Washington's Birthday by the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands [Francisco A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address of Hon. Francisco Delgado, Philippine Resident Commissioner, delivered in Alexandria, Va., at the annual celebration of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, February 22, 1935, in honor of George Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In expressing deep appreciation for the honor and privilege of participating in this great annual celebration of Alexandria-Wash-participating in this great annual celebration of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, in honor of its first worshipful master, may I be permitted to say that I fully realize that this was done to honor not me personally but rather the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of the Philippine Islands, to which I belong, and the people I humbly represent in this country.

And it is most fitting that a Filipino Mason should thus participate in rememorating the birth of so great a Mason and so great a world benefactor as Worshipful Brother Washington, because there exist special reasons why Philippine Masonry and the Filipinos, as a people, should claim, with their brethren of America, primacy in their love, respect and veneration of Gen. George Washington.

This is not only a legal holiday celebrated through the length Mashington.

This is not only a legal holiday celebrated through the length and breadth of the Philippines, but is also one of the few events celebrated annually by the Masonic fraternity there. In joining you heartily in this celebration as I do, therefore, I am expressing not only my own deep and sincere feelings but also those of the most worshipful grand lodge of the Philippines, with its 109 lodges and more than 6,000 members, and the remainder of the 14 million inhabitants of our islands.

A brief and summary examination of the historical background and the present situation of Masonry in the Philippines will immediately reveal the special interest of the members of the craft there in this celebration.

The first chronicled event concerning Freemasonry in the Philippines refers to the trial of two Irishmen by the Tribunal of Inquisition in Manila in 1756 for what was then regarded as the inquisition in Manila in 1756 for what was then regarded as the crime of being a Freemason. They were acquitted, but neither history nor tradition records the reason for the acquitted. However, knowing as I do the genius of our Irish brethren, I venture to say that it must have been not on the ground of disavowal of Masonry but by a flash of their quick and natural wit, which must have dazzled the stern judges of that monster of modern civilization.

It is also recorded that during the years 1762-4, while Manila was under British military occupation, that an English field lodge did Masonic work in the very cathedral of that city. Neither of those events, however, left any lasting impressions of Masonry on Philippine soil.

It was not until 1856 that the first Masonic lodge was regularly established in the Philippines, under charter from the Grand Orient of Portugal. Later on in the eighties many other lodges established in the Philippines, under charter from the Grand Orient of Portugal. Later on in the eighties many other lodges were organized under charters from the Gran Oriente de España, the Gran Oriente España, the Gran Oriente España, and the Grand Orient of France. It was this type of militant Masonry, militant because of persecutions and by force of circumstances, that first germinated in the Philippines to fight fanaticism and obscurantism. It brought the spark of liberty, equality, and fraternity into the breasts of the Filipinos and inspired them to throw off the yoke of tyranny then prevailing in their country, through the revolution of 1896.

By providential design, America came to the Philippines in 1899, and with the advent of her valiant soldiers her type of Masonry was brought into the Philippines. It was the Field Lodge of the North Dakota Regiment of Volunteers that was first organized in 1899, but the same disappeared as soon as that regiment was ordered home. However, from 1901 to 1907 three regular lodges were chartered by the Grand Lodge of California, and henceforth we see securely planted in the Philippines that system of Masonry which uses the moral, mental, and spiritual improvement of its individual members to uplift and help their fellow men. In 1912 these three lodges organized the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of the Philippine Islands, which shortly thereafter absorbed by affiliation all the regular lodges organized under the foreign jurisdictions except one chartered by the Grand Lodge of Scotland, which to this day operates in the city of Manila.

It was through this medium that the Masonic confusion prevailing in the Philippines for a time was ended and the Masonry of American origin superseded all other types previously existing there. So that now, and for two decades past, symbolic Masonry in the Philippines is a direct descendant of the type of Masonry prevailing in North America, with exactly the same moral and mental standards, substantially the same ritual, and obs faithfully the same landmarks and the same tenets of brotherly

And the same is true as regards the higher bodies of Scottish Rite in existence there now, for they all belong and operate under the authority of the Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States.

Nurtured as they are from the traditions and the same sources of inspiration, it is but natural that the Filipino Masons of today should, in your own fashion and with the same reverence and affection, look up to the exemplary life and conduct of Worshipful Brother George Washington as a guiding star to follow and a goal

Brother George Washington as a guiding star to follow and a goal worthy of attainment.

Are not his integrity, self-effacement, and humility, his deep love of family and neighbor, his fortitude in adversity, his fair and just treatment of his inferiors, his condescension to his equals, his respect for and intelligent obedience to his superiors, his unfinching firmness in the performance of duty, his uncompromising attitude toward vice and corruption, his insistence on morality and religiousness as essential to the stability of human institutions, and his devotion to liberty within law and order—in short, are not the many virtues adorning his character which were so zealously put into practice in his everyday life the very aims and purposes of our great and truly universal fraternity, as you and we understand it?

The memory of his deeds ought ever to be held as a glittering

The memory of his deeds ought ever to be held as a glittering pattern to every known Mason in all climes. For, to use the sub-lime lines of one of the poets of our craft, he was, indeed—

"The great in heart, the great in mind, Who looked thru Masonry to God, And looked thru God to all mankind, Learned more than word or sign or grip, Learned man's and God's relationship."

On the other hand, a glance at American-Philippine relationship would at once show why the Filipinos should be eternally grateful to America, and that the truly altruistic and unparalleled policy followed by the United States Government in the Philippines may directly be traced to Washington's own ideas and thoughts of the fundamentals of that government.

True it is that you can no more speak of America's greatness without mentioning the greatness of Washington than you can of the advanced civilization of Greece without mentioning her great philosophers or the grandeur of Greece without mentioning her great philosophers, or the grandeur of Rome without exalting her Ca

philosophers, or the grandeur of Rome without exalting her Caesars, or the glories of the French Empire without touching upon the genius of Napoleon. These are as much inseparable concepts as that of the body and soul when referring to a human body. It is equally true that the history of America is in itself in its own period the history of the world. Indeed, Washington is not merely a sage and a hero of the United States of America, but of the entire world, because the beneficent results of his deeds have affected the four corners of the globe.

Withal there is such a close relationship between the funda-

Withal, there is such a close relationship between the fundamental ideas of government as he conceived and put them into practice during the formative period of the Government of this greatest of all republics and the blessings subsequently carried and transplanted into the Philippine Archipelago that the Filipinos became readily the direct beneficiaries of the wise policies recommended by him.

As early as December 4, 1788, Washington wrote:

"The more I am acquainted with agricultural affairs the better I am pleased with them, insomuch that I can nowhere find so great satisfaction as in those innocent and useful pursuits. In indulging these feelings I am glad to reflect how much more delightful to an undebauched mind is the task of making improvements on the earth than all the vainglory which can be acquired from ravaging it by the most uninterrupted career of conquests.

ravaging it by the most uninterrupted career of conquests."

Again in his Farewell Address, among other things, he said:
"Profoundly penetrated by this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to do the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration, in every department, may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation, and so prudent use of this blessing, as to acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and the adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it."

And further:

And further:

"Observe faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be, that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and (at no distant period) a great nation, to give to making the magnanimous and too novel example of a people, always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it. Can it be, that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?"

Now, note the resemblance of the magnanimous policies thus suggested by President Washington with those enunciated by President McKinley (another illustrious member of our craft) in his instructions of January 20, 1899, to the first Philippine Commission wherein he expressed the hope that the Commissioners would be received as bearers of the "richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation", and directed that the insular government that they were about to establish be a "government not for the satisfaction of the American people but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the Filipinos", and that "their customs and habits, even their prejudices were to be considered" considered.'

This was reaffirmed in his message to Congress in the same year, when, among other things concerning the Philippines, he said: "The Philippines are ours not to exploit but to develop, civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to the mighty trust committed to us."

It was in the furtherance of these altruistic policies that the Congress of the United States on July 1, 1902, enacted the first organic act for the government of the Philippine Islands, wherein the fundamentals of a democratic and republican form of government as first conceived by Washington and the makers of the American Declaration of Independence and the United States Con-American Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution were embodied.

Those instructions and the provisions of that organic act were generally carried out by the members of the first Philippine Commission, Governor Taft (another great and honored member of our craft) and his successors in that office, with the result that progress was made in the Philippines in all lines of endeavor by

leaps and bounds.

Indeed, the advancement made was so rapid that by August 1916, upon the recommendation of President Wilson, the Sixty-fourth Congress wrote into law the second part of what might be termed the "Charter of Philippine Liberty", commonly known as the "Jones Law", which further advanced the freedom enjoyed by the Filipino people and contains this declaration so similar to the sentiments expressed by Presidents Washington and McKinley:

"Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

"Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

"Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippine Islands as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the right of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers they may be better fitted to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all privileges of complete independence" and so forth.

In 1922, upon the report made by Governor Harrison (another illustrious member of our craft) of the favorable conditions then existing in the Philippines, President Wilson recommended to the Congress of the United States the granting of complete inde-pendence to the Philippine Islands. But the Great Architect of the Universe willed that the next step toward Philippine emancipation Universe willed that the next step toward Philippine emancipation be deferred until another great President and true Mason, the present occupent of the historic White House, should be at the helm of this Government. And thus it was that the final step, in the form of what is known as the "Tydings-McDuffie Act", upon the recommendation of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, was approved by the Seventy-third Congress on March 24, 1934. The title of said act is: "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." other purposes.

Onerous and hard as indeed are some of the conditions therein imposed, it was nevertheless gratefully accepted, as required in one of the sections thereof, by the Filipino people through the Philippine Legislature on May 1, 1934. Also, in accordance with some of the provisions thereof, a constitutional convention consisting of delegates from every nook and corner of the Philippine Archipelago was convoked and set in session in Manila continuously from July 30, 1934, to February 18, 1935, when the members thereof signed the constitution they unanimously adopted. A mission is now on its way from Manila to the United States bringing authentic copies of the constitution for submission to the President of the United States as required by the Tydings-McDuffle Law.

If press reports from neutral and impartial sources may be believed, it may be affirmed that the constitution as adopted by the Philippine Constitutional Convention as a whole has met the gen-

Philippine Constitutional Convention as a whole has met the general approval and commendation of all. It is virtually a transplantation of a truly democratic and popular government, as conceived and put into practice here, to the tropical Philippines with only such changes as to details as were necessitated by local requirements.

For 35 years a public-school system has been in operation in For 35 years a public-school system has been in operation in the Philippines under American guidance and standards, wherein English has been the sole medium of instruction. American history and the life story of such American heroes as George Washington, Patrick Henry, and John Marshall, to mention only a few of the Virginia cavaliers, have been taught continuously to the 1,200,000 school children attending our public schools annually. Is it any wonder, then, that English should have become a common language among us and that the youngest of our school children should have become familiar with the great deeds and benefactions of President Washington and the other illustrious great Americans?

In passing I may relate the following story as illustrative of the regard for President Washington even among our small children:

The members of the class in a grade school were required by their teacher to write an essay on George Washington, and this is what the youngest boy in the class wrote about him: "America, or Uncle Sam, which is the same, has done many good things for the Philippines and is just like a real uncle to the Filipinos. Washington is the Father of his Country and the founder of its Government, and therefore he is the good old grandaddy of the Philippines and of the Filipinos. And so in my prayers I always ask God to bless pop and mom, Uncle Sam, and good old Grand-daddy Washington."

daddy Washington."
So it is that as America's great and magnanimous task in the Philippines is about to be consummated, having kept full faith

Philippines is about to be consummated, having kept full faith with her plighted word, as prophetically envisioned by Washington, she will ever be blessed not only by the present generation of Filipinos and their children but by all the future generations and their children's children until time shall be no more. And the memory of George Washington, the Father of his Country, and his good deeds for America and the world will ever live in the grateful hearts of every Filipino.

Discontinuance of political relations will not change the feelings of gratitude and loyalty of the Filipino people to America and the American people. On the contrary, it will enhance them. Upon the Latin-Occidental foundation laid out by the 350 years of Spanish control in the Philippines, you have built a modern twentieth century superstructure of Anglo-Saxon western civilization, and nothing shall ever separate that part of the East known as the Philippines from the western nations except your own will and pleasure.

Regardless of political ties, the Philippines being the vanguard Regardless of political ties, the Philippines being the vanguard of Christianity and occidental civilization in the Far East, we shall always be close to you masonically, culturally, spiritually, religiously, and commercially as long as you permit us to do so and as close as you wish us to be. We will, to a man, always stand by the principles and standards which Washington's teachings and vision, and those emulating him, have brought to us until we pass out from this terrestrial abode to the celestial lodge

MOB VIOLENCE AND LYNCHING

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the RECORD a joint resolution of the Senate and House of the Assembly of the State of New Jersey, memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt measures directed against mob violence and lynching.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a joint resolution of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt measures directed against mob violence and lynching, approved February 21, 1935, reading as follows:

Whereas in many sections of the United States crimes of vio-lence are rapidly increasing, both in numbers and in seriousness; and

whereas one of the most deplorable types of crime is the wanton destruction of human life, public and private property by mobs under so-called "lynch law"; and

Whereas such crimes strike at the very fundamentals of our constitutional rights and our system of democratic government, tending, if unchecked, to result in an absolute disregard for and defiance of duly constituted agencies charged with the protection of life and property and with the proper enforcement of our criminal laws; and

Whereas a continuel disregard of the taking of human life.

Whereas a continual disregard of the taking of human life and the destruction of property by irresponsible individuals banded together under the influence of excitement to usurp the prerogatives of legal agencies devoted to the apprehension, prosecution, and punishment of criminals, can but encourage the rising tide of violence; and

Whereas a stable government can only be maintained where the courts, operating under due process of law, shall be the only agency or power permitted to deprive any citizen of his constitutional rights to life and liberty; and

Whereas we firmly believe that this unfortunate situation can be best curtailed and eradicated through the power of our Federal Government: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

 That the Congress of the United States now in session be memorialized and requested to, as speedily as possible, adopt and pass some remedial measure and to take such other action as may pass some remedial measure and to take such other action as may be necessary, fit, and proper to curtail as far as possible under the Federal laws this growing national evil of mob violence and lynching, to the end that everyone in the United States of America may be accorded and guaranteed full protection of life, liberty, and property under our Constitution; be it further Resolved, That copies of this joint resolution be transmitted to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of New 2. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

Approved February 21, 1935.

I am in full accord with the viewpoint expressed in such resolution and favor the adoption of such legislation. My colleagues from New Jersey have likewise a favorable opinion with respect to the same and desire for the early enactment of a law to effectuate the purpose of the resolution.

HOME OWNERS' LOAN ACT OF 1933

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6021) to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, be given a privileged status.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, before this measure is given a privileged status I think the Congress and the country ought to know who is going to administer the affairs of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. If we authorize an additional $1,500,000,000 of the Corporation's bonds, are the men now under indictment to be kept in charge of certain offices? Are the 100 charges of criminal violations of law against a certain office in Michigan to be surveyed; and will the Rules Committee have the courage to report out the resolution to investigate the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which resolution is now before that committee, before we attempt to continue this maladministration in the hands of the same chairman, the members of the board, and some of the State managers?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that the Republican members on the Rules Committee will be glad to vote for his investigation.

Mr. SWEENEY. I thank the gentleman, but I think it is up to the Members on this side to clean their own house and demand this investigation. This is not a matter of politics. The principle of clean government is at issue.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CALIFORNIA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk House Joint Resolution No. 94, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 8, line 16, after "may", insert "be."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to objectand I shall not object-if I remember correctly, the Senate has made no material change in the resolution as it passed the House.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They made but one amendment, and that was the insertion of the word "be" only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

PROGRESSIVE VETERANS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I made an attempt to call to the attention of this House the birth and development of the liberal thought and demand for action in California.

I tried to show that many people have come to the realization that our potential national wealth is great enough to abolish the poverty-stricken conditions here completely if only sanity and intelligence could be injected into the control and operation of our economic machinery.

Yesterday I received a letter from a friend of mine in Long Beach. He had enclosed a pamphlet put out by an organization called the Progressive Veterans of America, with national headquarters in Los Angeles.

I want to indulge in a few pertinent quotations:

It is our intention at this time to lay down in broad general principles the basis for an organization to be established for the purpose of securing for our people, through the efforts of their outstanding patriots, a fair and equitable treatment from all the controlling forces by which they live.

As veterans of those wars fought for the purpose of maintaining and preserving the liberties inherent in the ideals of American government, we feel called upon to offer our services in what we consider the most important war in the history of our Nation—consider the most important war in the history of our Nation-

consider the most important war in the history of our Nation—the war against poverty.

We believe that it is our right to be heard and to make our influence felt in the life of the people whose liberty we have been called upon to preserve. As citizens and soldiers, and as those who have earned a right to call themselves true American patriots, it is our intention to form at this time an organization through which we can again express our devotion and sacrifice to the people of our country, and abolish poverty in this great Republic of plenty.

plenty.

It is our intention to pursue the aims of this organization with dignity, and through methods fully sanctioned by the laws of our country. It is our plan to present, in a forceful and decisive way, whatever solutions or suggestions we might have to offer to any of the pressing social, economic, and political problems of our evils can be eliminated in our national life.

We present ourselves to the public at large as an organization whose sole purpose is to seek, through honesty and integrity, means by which unhealthy and destroying social and economic evils can be eliminated in our national life.

One of our chief principles must be that we are not to be frightened into any kind of surrender or compromise by forces operating for purely selfish purposes; that whatever programs we sponsor shall be advanced solely for the greater good of all the people and never in the service of a small, specialized, or greedy minority. We, as soldiers, are not to be "used" by any self-seeking group, nor will we permit such a group to express itself through us or exploit the people behind the shield of that true patriotism which is beyond personal ambition.

One of the first and most important of the propositions of our organization is the fact that our membership individually as well

one of the first and most important of the propositions of our organization is the fact that our membership individually, as well as a whole, insists that no Fascist form of government shall take the place of our constitutional democracy. It is becoming increasingly evident that the veterans of the United States are being persuaded by subtle and dangerous propaganda to sponsor or support or in other ways aid movements which are in reality directly expressed to those principles of liberty for which they have ctly opposed to those principles of liberty for which they have sacrificed so much.

We believe it is the right of any American citizen to examine the principles of his Government, and we defend that right against hysterical, unreasonable, and thoroughly untenable accusations that an intelligent survey of our problems is necessarily a subversive movement

Realizing the tragic truth that self-seeking interests have in the past used patriotism as a smoke screen behind which they worked for the ruination of our people, it is our intention to inform our fellow veterans of their true position in our social order, and to impress upon them the obligations they accepted when they we pledge our support for the passage of legislation that will put into effect the short-hour day and the short-day week.

We further pledge ourselves as an organization to foster or aid any program that has for its purpose Government ownership and control of public utilities where such control can be proven to be of direct benefit to the consumer in terms of lowered rates for such vital services.

And, further, as a result of the recent investigation of our banking system, we urge that the Government operate, own, and control that system, in order to secure the people, not only against recurrences of catastrophe in our financial system, but to broaden and make more serviceable to the people at large these institutions that form the center of our financial structure.

We protest against those men and organizations who abuse the safety of the country by their sole desire to secure a profit from the manufacture of implements of national protection. We insist that the profits be taken out of the manufacture of war materials, and we further declare ourselves in favor of the elimination of all and we further declare ourselves in favor of the elimination of all profits in times of war.

An important part of our program of operation shall be to tender the services of properly constituted committees to those agencies that have for their purpose the employment of surplus labor in cooperative plans of production.

We emphatically declare against the taxation of small incomes where it is the intention to place upon them the burdens which where it is the intention to place upon them the burdens which are more easily borne by those incomes in larger brackets, and we believe that a liberal limit should be made on the property of the small-income classes which should be free from taxes of any sort. We further oppose all forms of sales tax that is directly chargeable to the consumer and insist that the maintenance of government be derived from taxes on income and profit.

We refuse to subscribe to the reactionary demands of greedy business and commercial groups that have organized themselves for the sole purpose of continuing and augmenting the enormous privileges that have permitted them to exploit the citizens of the United States.

We ask that a sufficient income tax shall be levied on both individual and corporate incomes, to maintain the educational opportunities to which our children are entitled.

It is our purpose to protect our Government from reactionary subversive interests and to present a united front for an intelligently progressive attitude in national affairs.

We make no stand against the taking of fair profit in business enterprise and defend the rights of business under our American system to conduct itself as an important part of our economic structure, but in return we definitely demand that profit making stay within its own limitations; that it make no attempt to coerce or to secure for itself special privileges through its powers of wealth; that it not be permitted to endanger or unbalance the economic system in ruthless pursuance of the profit motive, and that above all, it shall allow the American people to live in security and peace and happiness. peace and happiness.

Gentlemen, that declaration was made by a group of men who risked everything in the defense of the country they love. It is not made by Communists, Fascists, wild-eyed radicals, or crackpots. It was made by red-blooded Americans. How much longer will we deny the wishes of these people?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The other day I presented a bill in reference to this pink-slip provision, providing that a pink slip would not be necessary in the case of individuals whose net income was less than $3,000. The bill comes to me printed $3,500. May I inquire who will make the change? The SPEAKER. I suggest that the gentleman take that matter up with the Parliamentarian.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of very great importance and information to the House. This morning in my mail I received the following letter from a constituent:

I wholly disapprove of the bills in the hands of Congress concerning every kind of business in the United States. Yours truly.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes and discuss the centennial anniversary of the birth of Mark Twain, who was born in my congressional district on March 1, 1835.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a joint memorial addressed to the House by the Town Council of the City of Nampa, Idaho.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Nampa, Idaho, relative to the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan, as follows:

TOWNSEND MEMORIAL ADOPTED BY NAMPA CITY COUNCIL FEBRUARY 18. 1935

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Nampa, Idaho: Whereas the United States Government is seeking ways and means to end the depression and restore prosperity in our country; and

Whereas no plan tried so far has succeeded in obtaining that goal; and Whereas Whereas the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan, if adopted, has every indication of success in terminating the depression and restoring prosperity and therefore is worthy of trial: Now,

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Nampa, Idaho, That it is heartly in favor of the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan and that it hereby memorializes the United States Congress to enact the same into law; and be it further Resolved, That the city clerk of the city of Nampa be hereby directed to forward a copy of this resolution to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Senators William E. Borah and James P. Pope, to the Congressmen from the State of Idaho, Compton I. White and D. Worth Clark, and to both Houses of the Idaho State Legislature. Approved February 18, 1935.

Councilmen.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed by the mayor and City Council of the City of Nampa, Idaho, at their regular meeting held February 18, 1935.

F. KUEHN, Jr., City Clerk.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 249), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAMBERTSON reserved all points of order.

PREVENTION OF PROFITEERING IN TIME OF WAR

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 133

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 5529, a bill to prevent profiteering in time of war, and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense, and promote peace. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and pending that, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Lambertson] what his pleasure is in reference to general debate?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I have a few requests over here, but not a great many. It occurred to me that possibly general debate might end today except on the bill itself and then allow general debate tomorrow to be on the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That will be satisfactory to our side.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill continue during the balance of the day, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Lambertson] and myself, and that on tomorrow general debate be limited to the bill itself.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. The time to be equally divided?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Lambertson] and myself

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Is the gentleman's request that general debate be concluded today, including general debate on the bill itself?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We will take the bill up under the 5-minute rule, and the debate will be confined to the bill.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I thought perhaps we would have general debate limited to the bill itself tomorrow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, if a Member is talking on the bill at the expiration of his time and asks for an additional 5 minutes, I think we may be liberal with him. My thought was that the general debate after today ought to be confined to the bill itself.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. That was my idea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6223), with Mr. Mead in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Mansfield].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, agriculture is our foremost industry, and cotton constitutes a crop of the first magnitude. One-third of the people of the United States are vitally interested in the success of this important industry.

For many years our home production of cotton has been greater than that of all the rest of the world. It has not only supplied our domestic needs, but cotton has held the lead over all other commodities in our export trade. Slightly more than 55 percent of the cotton produced in the United States in recent years has found a market abroad.

For the past 15 years our home consumption of cotton has remained practically the same, though our population increased enormously during that time. For the 14-year period from 1920 to 1933, inclusive, our average annual consumption was 6,070,407 bales.

During that time our population increased from 105,-710,620 in 1920 to 125,693,000 in 1933. Still there was no increase in the consumption of cotton in the United States. In fact, the 105,000,000 people in 1921 actually consumed 209,000 more bales than was consumed by the more than 125,000,000 people in 1933.

Our cotton exports increased slightly during the 14-year period. This relieved, to a certain extent, the loss sustained in domestic consumption. Our annual average of exports for the period was 7,363,227 bales. The largest amount of exports in any year was in 1926, when 10,926,614 bales of American cotton was marketed abroad.

The following year, 1927, the average price of cotton advanced from 12.5 to 20.2 cents per pound, notwithstanding the fact that the world production in that year was above the average for the 14-year period, to the extent of 182,065 bales. The enormous exports of the previous year undoubtedly exerted an influence for this advance in market price in 1927.

The average annual home production of cotton during the 14-year period 1920-33 was 13,237,785 bales. The average foreign production was 10,006,150 bales. The average world production was 23,243,935 bales. I am inserting in the Record at this point table of figures obtained from the Census Bureau, showing the production, distribution, and average price of cotton for the 14-year period from 1920 to 1933.

In these calculations there is no reference to the crop of ! 1934. The results of that year are not yet fully known. Even if known they would be useless for statistical purposes, as conditions were abnormal.

Due to the crop restriction measures authorized by Congress, superinduced by the great drought in the Southwestern States, our production of cotton in 1934 was reduced to less than 10,000,000 bales. This was 3,000,000 bales below the 14-year average. The foreign production in 1934 is estimated at 13,225,000 bales, or about 3,000,000 bales above the 14-year average.

Notwithstanding our reduction in cotton last year was just about offset by the increased production abroad, our farmers actually received more than double the market price they received the year before. This saved them from financial ruin and justified the extreme measures adopted which contributed to their recovery.

These measures were intended for emergency relief only, and have served their purpose. A permanent policy should now be established. A policy that will aid the farmer and not injure other branches of the cotton industry.

In establishing a permanent policy for cotton, the question of our foreign markets cannot be ignored. If we are to lose our foreign markets entirely, then our production must be limited to home consumption, which has averaged but little more than 6,000,000 bales.

This would reduce us to less than half of our present average production. It would be the equivalent of only twothirds of the short crop produced in 1934 under the restrictive measures of the Bankhead and the Agricultural Adjustment Acts, plus the great drought.

Assuming that our 9.000.000-bale crop of 1934 was sold at an average of 12 cents, then a 6,000,000-bale crop must bring 18 cents to realize an equal amount. The world price, of course, might be considerably less than 18 cents.

Domestic mills would not pay the 18 cents for American cotton unless forced to do so by a tariff wall. Behind such a tariff wall all cotton goods would be pyramided to consumers at enormous prices, under the compensatory duties that would be demanded, and which have seldom, if ever, been denied by Congress.

If our foreign markets are to be abandoned, the southwestern cotton-producing States would be placed at a great disadvantage as compared to the Southeastern States. The cotton mills are practically all located in New England and in Georgia and the Carolinas. Cotton grown in the Eastern States has the advantage of a comparatively shorter haul and correspondingly lower freight rate by either rail or truck.

The all-rail freight rate on cotton from Galveston and Houston to the New England mills located at Fall River, New Bedford, Taunton, Willimantic, and Danielson is $1.54 per hundredweight, or $7.70 per bale. The rate to the Carolina mills at Gastonia, Charlotte, Concord, Kannapolis, Anderson, Greenville, and Spartanburg is $1.01 per hundredweight, or $5.05 per bale. This rate to the Carolinas is only temporary and expires July 5, 1935. After that date the normal rate of $1.22 per hundredweight, or $6.10 per bale, is to be restored.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Can the gentleman tell us what the water rate is from Galveston to New England?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am coming to that point right now. The combined rail-and-water rate from Texas ports to New England mills ranges from $1.75 to $2.90 per bale, Fall River and New Bedford having the advantage over Taunton, Willimantic, and Danielson in such shipments.

The export rates on cotton from Texas ports to European and Asiatic countries are generally slightly less than $2 per bale. They are fixed by conference agreements for the different ranges, the average being about 35 cents per hundredweight, or $1.75 per bale.

These shipping rates account for the fact that cotton from Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and much of that from Mississippi, western Tennessee, and Alabama goes into other laws. His proposal is for the cotton farmer to receive the export trade. Our home mills are supplied from the Eastern cotton-producing States, where they have the advantage of short hauls by either rail or truck lines.

This statement is fully verified by the record. In 1933 the cotton shipped through the ports of Texas totaled 6,198,496 bales. This cotton was grown principally in Texas and Oklahoma. Of this amount, 5,749,616 bales was exported to European and Asiatic countries.

The cotton shipped from Texas ports in the coastwise trade amounted to only 448,880 bales. The major portion of these coastwise shipments went to New England mills, though a small portion of it was afterward exported from Atlantic ports.

Of the cotton shipped out through the ports of Texas in 1933, 93 percent went directly into exports, and 7 percent in coastwise trade. Of the shipments through the port of New Orleans, 83 percent was exports and 17 percent coastwise. Of the shipments through the port of Mobile, 75 percent was exports and 25 percent in coastwise trade.

If deprived of our foreign markets, the shipments of cotton from the Gulf ports would have to go to eastern mills. either by ship or by rail. The cotton farmers of the Southwestern States would have to pay an average of about three times the transportation costs paid by the eastern cotton farmer.

The coastwise shipments may be eliminated entirely, if the merchant marine is placed under the Interstate Commerce Commission as proposed by the Eastman plan. The only reason for such consolidation is to prevent the ships from taking business from the railroads.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas permit an interruption?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. If such a policy were followed, can the gentleman tell the committee briefly what percentage it would increase the transportation cost of cotton approxi-

Mr. MANSFIELD. As I have just stated, it ranges from $1.75 to $2.90 a bale by water and $7.70 by rail to New England mills from Texas, Oklahoma being the same, of course. Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield. Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it the gentleman's opinion that if we did not have water transportation available, the rates for the rail haul would be what they are today?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Everyone can form his own conclusion as to that, of course.

In other words, I am wondering Mr. WOODRUFF. whether the competition afforded by water transportation does tend to hold down freight rates.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think that is universally conceded:

This is the age of subsidies. Practically every industry in the United States is now actually receiving a subsidy in some form, either direct or indirect. The banks, the factories, the great insurance companies, the waterways, the highways, the railways, the airways, the merchant marine, and various others. Some of these subsidies are camouflaged, others are

The ship subsidy has been in the guise of mail contracts, The President says the subsidy is necessary and should be in the open. I agree with him. As a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I expect to support that policy. I want the people to know where the money is

We are now subsidizing agriculture. Much of it is in the open, but some of it camouflaged in the form of loans, some of which were never expected to be repaid. I have supported all these measures. I now want to place agriculture where it can survive without loans.

Mr. J. E. McDonald, commissioner of agriculture of Texas. is advocating a measure for the relief of the cotton farmer, to take the place of the A. A. A. and the Bankhead Acts and an outright subsidy on that portion of the crop which is necessary for home consumption. Then, let him grow as much, or as little, as he pleases for the export trade, and, on that portion of his crop, he would take his chances with the world.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If we have reduced our crop 3,000,000 bales, and foreign growers have increased theirs 3,000,000 bales, with the subsidies we have placed now on cotton, we have increased the price above that of foreign countries, and how can the cotton farmers of this country do any exporting, or how are they going to sell cotton in this country, unless they have a tariff wall?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I believe if they are limited to six or seven million bales for home consumption our home mills will buy foreign cotton at lower prices in preference to buying our own cotton, and I believe that under such circumstances Congress would place a tariff wall against the importation of cotton from other countries.

Mr. RICH. This would be necessary in order to protect the cotton farmers?

Mr. MANSFIELD. To protect the cotton farmers, perhaps. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Under this plan we would hold our export trade. Farmers would receive perhaps more and better benefits than they are now receiving. Cotton pickers, ginners, compressors, oil-mill workers, exporters, railways, and ship lines would all receive benefits, of which they are deprived under the present restrictive laws. The cost to the Government is expected to be no more, but probably less, than the agencies now in force. Mr. McDonald believes that the necessary funds can be raised by a processing tax, though I understand his definite plans for the purpose have not yet been entirely worked out.

The main thing necessary under such a system should be to safeguard the farmer who has heretofore diversified his crops in the general interest. In order to do this the farm quotas should be based upon acreage of cultivatable land instead of an average production basis, as was the case in the operation of the Bankhead law. Another safeguard should be placed to protect the small farmer as compared to the commercial farmer.

I hope our able Secretary of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture, which have done such wonderful work in the interest of the farmer, may be able to work out a scheme for the general recovery of the cotton industry in all its branches

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Cali-

Mr. COLDEN. Does not the gentleman from Texas believe that the farmer who lives on his farm and actually tills the soil should have preferential treatment as against the commercial farmer or the man who lives in the city and has a large number of tenants?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think the gentleman is eminently correct. I think it is the duty of Congress to protect the little man who needs such protection in preference to the wealthy or the large commercial farmer. This is the point I was making when the gentleman asked his question. I hope our able Secretary of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture, who have been doing such wonderful work in the last year or two for the benefit of the farmers all over this land, will be able to work out a permanent policy, not only for the cotton farmer but for farming generally, and let us have this policy to take the place of the measures that have been enacted for the emergency.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.
Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman believe that the Bankhead bill really tends to help the large landowner rather than to help the poor tenant farmer?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I hardly know how to answer the question. I do not think the Bankhead bill has had any effect at all this year. It was not enacted until the 21st of April last, when the President signed the measure and cotton was already planted. It did not go into effect until the 12th of July, under regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture, and cotton was then being picked. I do not think it affected the production or the price, but I think the drought, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and the loans of 10 and 12 cents per pound had some effect. The Government now has more than 4,100,000 bales of cotton on hand on which they have made loans of 10 or 12 cents. This cotton will be depressing the price for another year unless it can be exported or disposed of in some way.

Mr. SHORT. There are many tenant families on our plantations that have been thrown out of employment due to the restricted acreage.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Thousands of cotton pickers in my State have been thrown out of employment.

Mr. SHORT. They have suffered terribly in my State also.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. I am sorry I did not get to hear all of the gentleman's fine address. I have enjoyed his remarks, because I consider him one of the ablest Members of the House. I should like to know if he has explained or will explain why we consume less cotton today with 20,000,000 more population.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The ladies are wearing too much silk.

Mr. SHORT. And it is also due to the increase in the rayon industry?

Mr. MANSFIELD. And the rayon industry; yes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. Taber].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk to the House for a few moments this morning on the question of the financial condition of the country, and to call the attention of the House and the country to what I believe to be some very salient facts and some things which I think the people of this country ought to begin to think about, and to some of the responsibilities which I think Congress ought to begin to take notice of.

For the fiscal years 1934, 1935, and 1936, ending on June 30 of each year, the appropriations for the regular annual running expenses of the Government are approximately $4,000,000,000. In addition to that there is being used, for regular running expenses, approximately five to six hundred million dollars of relief money, in addition to what has been heretofore the annual running expenses of the Government.

Our taxes are taking care of not more than $3,000,000,000 of these regular annual appropriations. So that we are running a deficit on our current operations of approximately $1,000,000,000 which goes into a bond issue.

Now, for emergency relief items directly, we are expending from four and one-half to five billion dollars a year, all of which goes into a bond issue, and none of which is raised out of our tax budget. All of that goes into the bond issue and adds to what the country owes.

Since the 4th of March 1933, there have been direct emergency appropriations of $7,200,000,000. In addition to that there have been transferred probably a billion dollars from other appropriations which had been made and have not been used for that particular purpose theretofore.

At the present time there is appropriated and unexpended $5,369,000,000 of emergency funds.

Let me say there is $1,700,000,000 of the $3,300,000,000 appropriated in June 1933 still unexpended. We were told then that we were faced with an emergency and we must appropriate the money right off because it would have to be used right away—just as we were told when the bill was before us 2 weeks ago for $4,880,000,000 that we must do it now.

The expenditures for relief in the last 2 years have been $2,400,000,000, and in addition to that we have spent approximately $500,000,000 on roads.

under these relief expenditures for work relief which have amounted to anything in the line of putting people to work or getting the money out and expended for a useful pur-

Now, we have had allotted to rivers and harbors and to reclamation projects items which have generally been appropriated for by Congress and which Congress could not pork barrel" itself into a program of extravagance sufficient to allow it to sponsor approximately a billion dollars. Most of this has not been spent, and most of it is still there doing nobody any good. The works that it will create are going to be a liability to the Government instead of an

Nothing has been accomplished by this expenditure of money except to put the Government into business, to destroy confidence, drive folks out of private employment. In that period of 2 years the relief rolls have very largely increased. Gentlemen know the situation in their own individual districts. The general picture shows a tremendous increase. In New York City alone in the last year the increase has been, as I understand it, from 250,000 families on relief to 375,000 families.

Our public debt in 1930 stood at $16,000,000,000. Today the public debt stands at twenty-eight and one-half billion dollars. If you add to that the $5,369,000,000 of emergency funds which have been appropriated and not yet expended, you have a figure of $33,869,000,000. If you add to that the $4,880,000,000 which we passed here the other day, and which has not yet become a law, you have almost $39,000,-000,000. If you add to that the $2,000,000,000 of the bonus, you have $41,000,000,000. If you add to that the $5,000,-000,000 of guaranty of home-loan and farm-loan bonds, a large part of which the Government must pay, you have approximately $46,000,000,000. There are approximately $5,000,000,000 of these guaranties. If you add to that the $2,000,000,000 that unquestionably will be authorized by this Congress of additional guaranties on the home-loan and farm-loan bonds, you have a national debt staring us in the face, when these funds which have been provided for by the House and which probably will be provided for by this Congress, are appropriated, of $48,000,000,000.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. TABER. Not yet. I shall in a moment.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Just to make the observation that also there are $20,000,000,000 of State and municipal indebtedness outstanding, bringing the total of national debt to $68,000,000,000, if the $48,000,000,000 figure is correct.

Mr. TABER. I have given the items and details. There cannot be any dispute about the details nor about the arithmetic. That is the way it stands now. I do not understand how we can go on in the way we are going, piling up the number of people who are on relief, not balancing our Budget, not feeling any sense of responsibility about balancing it, not getting anywhere. I am sick and tired of contradictory policies, and that is what we have had from the day that this administration started. Never in the world are we going to get out of this depression unless we come to our senses and balance the Budget.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TABER. I cannot yield to anyone. We must take care of the relief as it is necessary, but we cannot go on with these tremendous expenditures without breaking the backbone of the credit of the Government. It is absolutely impossible for any recovery to come with this kind of opera-

I am in hopes that the Committee on Ways and Means will not bring out the social-securities bill unless it provides the funds in the same bill by taxation to meet every dollar that will be required to be expended. I am in hopes that the Ways and Means Committee will bring out a tax bill which will tax this country to the point where it is balancing its Budget. Never in the world can we expect these wild

The roads expenditures have been the only expenditures | do anything toward bringing things to a head and stopping this depression, unless we get some sense in ourselves along that line. The net result of all its operation is more and more distress. The ultimate result, and that result will come as these terrible expenditures are pyramided onto the people of the country, will be a total collapse of the entire structure of Government, with wild inflation, printing-press money-nothing upon which we can build for recovery.

Now, I am making a plea at this time to Members on my side of the aisle and to the Members on the other side of the aisle to appreciate the situation we are facing in this country. We must put our house in order. We must stop these large expenditures and these things that are taking the lifeblood out of America.

The small business man throughout the country has been up against a terrific proposition. The N. R. A. and the A. A. A. have operated, insofar as they could by control, to wipe out the small business man and to leave nothing but the great big trusts. We are destroying the very fiber and backbone of America by the way we are operating. Is it not time that we should come to, that we should have a definite, forward-looking policy and try to provide the business men of our country with confidence? We tell the business man and the manufacturer that they must provide employment for our people, but we take away from them by the unsound operation of our Government and our finances the possibility of credit, and the sound confidence that he ought to have to let him proceed to give that employment. Oh, that our people should realize the situation that they are facing! Oh, that our people should come to the point where they are prepared to take their medicine in the line of taxes! Oh, that our people might realize what these terrible expenditures are doing to them and doing to their credit, and turn over a new leaf and stand up and try to do something to put the United States of America on its feet! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have a profound sympathy for the distress of the cotton farmer in the South. He has had hard times and has been obliged to endure great hardships in common with the masses everywhere-in every part of the United States. I am not opposing the cotton-processing tax on any narrow grounds of sectionalism or conflicting interests. As a matter of fact, I do not recognize any conflict of interests. I do not believe the legislation is beneficial to any class, although temporarily it may appear so to a few who are the beneficiaries of the experiment. I am opposed to the measure because it places a tremendous and unnecessary burden upon the textile industry, both North and South-an industry which has been in the doldrums for many years and which should be given the solicitous consideration of the Government rather than be pushed deeper into the mire. I do not believe the experiment will be beneficial ultimately to the cotton farmer in the South. We are never going to solve the difficulties of the cotton farmer through a dole to pay for not raising cotton.

Let us look coldly at the facts. Last year about 30,000,000 acres of cotton were planted in the United States, while the other countries planted 44,500,000 acres. These figures show conclusively cotton is not exclusively an American commodity, but a world commodity. We raise approximately 45 percent of the world crop, and other countries raise 55 percent. Obviously we can regulate the price of cotton only in the United States. There must be a world price outside of the confines of this country. Our success in selling cotton abroad depends upon price, quality, and service. Nothing else is material. Other countries can render as satisfactory service as we can, and, for the major part of the trade, the quality of the foreign cotton is satisfactory. Price remains the determining factor in our bid for foreign

If our price is higher than the world price, we must be expenditures to bring recovery, never in the world can we ready to reconcile ourselves to a complete loss of the foreign cotton trade. It is inevitable and must follow as surely as the night follows day.

These crop-reduction bills, I believe, are materially advancing the time when we shall have lost the major part of our cotton sales abroad. There are already substantial and threatening signs of what the future contains.

Japan, Greece, and Yugoslavia are trying to produce cotton. Great Britain, Belgium, and Italy are giving every encouragement to stimulate cotton production in their colonial possessions in Asia and Africa. Japan is stimulating cotton fields in Manchukuo and Korea. Brazil has completed a survey which dreams of a cotton domain larger than what exists at present in southern United States. These are disturbing signs and call for careful consideration before approving the continuance of an experiment which is hastening the ruin of the cotton trade.

Who benefits from this ill-advised experiment? This is a reasonable question when a Government, through an experiment, brings ruin to several millions of people so that a smaller group can be temporarily aided.

Obviously only a grower of cotton can reap any profit, or—to put it more definitely and more accurately—only the owner of a plantation. And the chief gainer is the largeplantation owner. The little farmer is not wildly enthusiastic over this experiment. He would have voted against its continuance last year except for the exemptions given when the referendum was in progress. A favorable verdict was necessary, and the little fellow was thrown a bone so he could record a favorable answer.

The large farmer is the chief gainer—I say "gainer" advisedly, because eventually he will lose, as will everyone who is engaged in the cotton trade. For a few pieces of silver, needed badly, to be sure, at the moment, he is willing to sell his future. All that can be said for this crop-reduction bill is that it gives some ready cash to the distressed planter.

Now let us turn to the other side of the picture, because there is another side which is entitled to consideration. Who is injured by this ill-advised experiment? First, let us direct our attention to the cotton fields. J. S. Wanamaker, of South Carolina, president of the Cotton Growers' Association, says the crop-reduction experiment has forced 40 percent of the cotton growers onto the Federal relief rolls. Think of that statement. I repeat, 40 percent of those engaged in growing cotton have been deprived of means of livelihood through this legislation. The opportunity to work has been denied many thousands since the inauguration of the policy to pay people for not raising cotton. How can we ever get the people back to work at a normal and gainful occupation if we are to continue to pass legislation which deprives people of their vocation? That is a phase of this question which is entitled to some thought.

This reduction program eventually means the loss of our foreign export market for cotton in our inability to meet the world price of cotton. It eventually means the stabilizing of the South on a 6,000,000-bale production, or just enough to take care of the home market. It has been estimated over a million families in the South will lose their opportunity for a livelihood if this is the goal that we arrive at.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Can the gentleman explain how the referendum on the renewal of the Bankhead bill carried so overwhelmingly? Is the gentleman familiar with that phase of it?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes. I understand concessions were made so the law would not apply to five or six hundred thousand small farmers.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman, then, believes that the tenant farmer and the share cropper were tricked into supporting this program?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Well, I do not know that they were tricked, but at least they were led astray. Probably that would be the better way to put it.

Mr. CULKIN. That group is now in distress as the result of this program?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The reports that come to me indicate they are very much in distress, and hundreds of thousands are obliged to go to the Federal Government for relief. This was due largely to the crop-reduction program.

Mr. CULKIN. Has the gentleman noticed that there has been introduced in the other body a bill involving the disbursement of a million dollars on the part of the Government for the relief of the share croppers and tenant farmers who have been displaced by this program?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am aware of such a bill. It indicates the distress existing in the cotton fields.

These people are engaged as farmers and laborers in picking, ginning, compressing, storing cottonseed oil, milling, shipping, merchandising, and so forth. It is serious to gamble with the livelihood of a populous section of our country.

It is serious to disturb the economic conditions of a great section of the country without thinking the problem clear through.

The survey down South reveals the chief beneficiaries are the larger cotton growers. Others benefit very little. It is understood clearly the South itself stands to suffer enormously in the years which are to come.

Now let us travel to the cotton-spinning industry, an industry with factories located in nearly every State in the Union; an industry which gives employment to millions of people; an industry which is particularly vital to the prosperity of the South and New England. What is the effect of this experiment on this large industry?

May I say the industry has been stripped of the greater part of its reserve money by the many years of depression? It is struggling desperately to live. It is upon this almost bankrupt industry the Government is placing the burden of carrying the cost of the cotton farmers' relief. I say it is unwise and manifestly unfair.

The processing tax is draining the lifeblood of the cottonspinning industry, both North and South. It has already contributed to the closing of one large concern employing 3,200 people in my district. It has been the factor which has closed many other plants in other sections of the country. Continue this experiment and you contribute to the closing of many other concerns.

Theoretically the tax is paid by the manufacturer and passed along to the consumer, but only theoretically. As a practical matter, in the present condition of the cloth market, the manufacturer finds he cannot add to the price of cloth the amount of the tax which its sponsors anticipated. The mill is asked to absorb the tax. When mills are running on an extremely narrow margin this creates a losing proposition. Factories cannot continue indefinitely to operate at a loss, and consequently the jobs of many thousands are in danger of being lost.

Neither can we overlook the fact the tax will cause consumers to look for substitute products for cotton. There are evidences of this taking place in rayon, silk, wool, linen, jute, and paper. These commodities are not obliged to pay the tax, and consequently are in a better position to take away some demand hitherto supplied by cotton. All this is a decided loss to the cotton grower, and some of it may easily become a permanent loss.

I have said nothing of the millions of consumers. In some instances they are assessed and find they are contributing to the cost of the experiment.

This is the situation we face as we are called upon to make a decision concerning the continuance of a policy which stands before the country branded with the mark of failure. Shall we continue this unwise experiment? I hope the answer will be "No."

Yet you ask, and I think quite properly, What about the distressed cotton farmer? Shall he be allowed to suffer? My answer would be emphatically "No." He should not be allowed to suffer. If he needs aid, he should be given relief. But do not pass the "check" to an industry worse off than the cotton grower. Do not create a situation which aids the planters and puts hundreds of thousands of other people on the relief rolls, a large part of whom are in the cotton-growing section. This is not helping to bring about the real.

recovery we seek. Do not contribute to the loss of the foreign markets if you want to prevent the South from being stabilized on a 6,000,000-bale basis. This is not helping anyone.

I believe it would be infinitely better for the farmer, the textile industry, the consumer, and the people of the United States generally if you went directly to the United States Treasury and gave the farmer a direct contribution of $125,-000,000. If this is a real relief measure, the cost should be borne by all the people and not by a single industry which itself is in a life-and-death struggle.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is also important to bear in mind at the present time that there is a broader question involved as the result of the processing tax imposed, where prices have been pyramided and pyramided without the purchasing power increasing commensurate therewith. We are now reaching the point—properly so—where we must consider legislation to protect the consumer.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is right in a way. There are some parts of the textile industry where the tax is not passed along and pyramided, but in other instances it is. The gentleman is particularly accurate when he says that on the question of foodstuffs it is a problem we must consider seriously—how far the poor consumer of this country, with his wages stationary and his condition desperate, can continue consuming goods and paying the high prices he is forced to pay.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. McCORMACK. We realize the necessity of action with reference to the farmer. It is a condition and not a theory.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We want to help him.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have advocated refinancing their farm mortgages at interest as low as 3 percent, the difference to be assumed out of general taxes, if necessary, provided the farmer makes substantial payments on account of the mortgage indebtedness, to ultimately get him out of debt, as far as the Federal Government is concerned. As we get him out of debt, this becomes less and less a Federal problem. The farmer's problem, from a tax angle, is local. He has no tax problem with reference to the Federal Government. He may have some transportation problems to which we should give consideration, such as charges for transporting his goods from the farm to the consumer. We from the industrial sections realize the spirit and we try to cooperate as much as possible; but, on the other hand, the time has now arrived when this Congress should and must give primary consideration to the industrial worker, who, when he is out of work, has no farm to go to, has no little place on which to grow produce, but who is dependent strictly upon charity or other public or governmental agencies. This pyramiding, working an extreme hardship upon the consumer, has now reached a stage where we must give consideration to it. Furthermore, the processing taxes should be reduced and reduced in an effort to try to control this pyramiding of prices, which is resulting so harmfully to the consumer.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is correct. There is no question but, with the increase in price beyond the purchasing power of the people, the demand for goods will be less, and consequently production has to be less, and we start upon a vicious circle which must in the end bring ruin to everybody.

I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. COLDEN. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts believe that not only his industries, but the farmer, also, is entitled to cost of production plus a reasonable profit on his labor?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not objecting to the farmer getting relief. I say if these cotton farmers need the $125,000,000 produced by the processing tax, we might better give them an outright gift of that sum right out of the Treasury. It would be better, on the whole, to do it that way and not bring disaster to millions of people as we are doing today with this unwise experiment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Harlan].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that owing to the shortness of my time I cannot yield for questions until I conclude my main statement. I regret also the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway], who made some remarks the other day which this talk is intended to answer.

On February 14 I addressed the House concerning H. R. 5493, a bill which is now pending before the Judiciary Committee, and which provides that members of the Cabinet may at all times occupy seats in both Houses of Congress and participate in debate under the rules of the House on questions pertaining to their departments. Also, that on 1 day each week they shall be required to attend these sessions, unless excused, for the purpose of answering questions pertaining to the work of their various departments.

Be it enacted, etc., That the members of the President's Cabinet shall be entitled to occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives with the right to participate in debate on matters relating to the business of their respective departments, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Senate and House, respectively.

SEC. 2. That said Cabinet members shall attend the sessions of the Senate on the opening of the sittings on Tuesday of each week, and the sessions of the House of Representatives on the opening of the sittings on Thursday of each week to give information asked by resolution or in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the Senate and House: Provided, That the answers to said questions would not be, in the opinion of the Cabinet member interrogated, against the welfare of the United States: Provided further, That the questions propounded comply with the rules of the Senate and House: And provided further, That the Senate and House may by resolution dispense with the attendance of one or more of said Cabinet members on any stipulated day.

I recommend a favorable report of this bill to the House by the committee, and a subsequent passage of the bill by the House, for the reason that the bill would give us a system of government which would provide, first, adequate executive power; second, continuing legislative control over the use and abuse of that power; and third, congressional leadership in the national interest.

Last Wednesday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] in his remarks on this bill took issue with the latter two propositions. He maintained that the proposed bill would not supply adequate legislative control and that our present system provides sufficient legislative leadership. He also contended that under our present system we have a greater expansion of Executive authority than is safe for democratic government.

During recent years there has been considerable discussion as to the effect of the operation of this system on Congress. The critics are divided into two classes, one presenting sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The other, diametrically opposite, has probably been best defended by former Secretary of the Treasury, David F. Houston, who, in an article in World's Work in June 1925, says.

Neither House of Congress will take its leadership from men brought in from the outside, men whom it does not select. Nor, in the long run, even if the President's party controls both Houses, will Congress tolerate obvious efforts of the President directly to lead it. And especially will it resent attempts of the President to force its hand by appeals over his head to the people.

Thus we have two definite groups, one saying that the seating of Cabinet members would throw all of the Government into the hands of the Executive, and the other saying that, due to the resentment which would be created, practically all Executive leadership would be destroyed. In view of most human experience with extreme viewpoints, the chances are that the truth lies between the two. That is, that the system would furnish reasonable, helpful Executive leadership in lawmaking, but that legislative jealousy would at the same time give Congress far more control over the abuse of Executive authority than we have ever known in this country.

It is well to remember that all of this discussion has occurred prior to the last two Presidential administrations and prior to the recent depression. During the first of these administrations, we have found that without strong leadership in the national interest, Congress becomes an easy prey to block and lobby. During the latter administration in the face of a national emergency, we have seen that Congress will readily yield to strong Executive leadership, so that our experience during the last 8 years has made the position of both opponents to Cabinet cooperation in legislation a very difficult one. Why is it, then, that during the many years that this plan has been under discussion, it has not as yet been accepted by the Congress? One obvious answer is that in very few periods of our history have we found an actual balance between the legislative and executive branches. In almost every administration either the executive or the legislative branch of government has been in the ascendant. When the executive was in power the President has been very slow to recommend the passage of such a bill for fear of losing that power, and when the Legislature was in control, of course, it has hesitated to jeopardize its position.

It is, of course, natural for us, as individuals, to fear unknown experiences. And it seems to be a very commendable trait in nations to hesitate in trying new experiments in government toward which they are not driven by absolute necessity. It is, no doubt, also because of this that the United States has been very hesitant in adopting this comparatively simple change in government. We have stood quietly on the side lines and seen practically every democratic government that has come into existence since our own adopt either all or a substantial part of Cabinet participation in lawmaking. Nearly every country in Europe that is not under some form of dictatorship requires the presence of Cabinet members in legislative assemblies, and the same is true of the South American Republics. We alone look askance at the whole procession, claiming to be fearful that our Executive would use this instrumentality to increase his power to the injury of the country.

This attitude is certainly not justified by the experience of other free governments, and especially is it clearly disproved by English history. For many centuries there was a struggle in England between the executive and legislative power as to which would be the controlling force in government. It was not until the present cabinet system was devised, in the early part of the nineteenth century, that for all time that question was settled in favor of the legislative branch. The House of Commons, by keeping the Cabinet constantly under its surveillance and subject to its direction, provided that so long as British institutions shall prevail that body shall be the controlling factor.

Yet we, according to the gentleman from Massachusetts, should be timorous about adopting even a short step in this direction, for fear that that short step will make the President a menace to our freedom.

Our own history has shown us that, without any exception, wherever the need of broad executive power has existed the President has seized that power and Congress has not quibbled while the emergency has been upon us. Apparently it would be almost impossible to adopt any system that would increase the present ability of the Executive to take unto himself any and all necessary power. The only thing that is left for us to do is to try to devise some system that will at all times, both normal and during emergencies, give the Legislature the right to control this power which will inevitably be taken when the occasion arises.

In 1837 Hon. Richard Fletcher, at that time a member of the Ways and Means Committee, in a speech in Faneuil Hall, Boston, complained that during Jackson's term of office the principal function of the Ways and Means Committee was going through the form of approving the laws which Jackson prepared and handed down to them for acceptance. It may not be merely a coincidence that the first effort in Congress to bring the President's Cabinet under the control of the House and Senate was in April 1864, during the close of the Lincoln administration, when Executive power had expanded beyond the precedence even of the Jackson. The committee considering this bill reported it favorably and complained bitterly of the manner in which the executive department unduly influenced the deliberation of the Legislature. The report says of the President's Cabinet:

It has been notorious for years that by personal interviews with Members, by private conversations at the office, in social intercourse, at casual meetings on the floor of the two Houses, by verbal statements to the chairmen of committees—liable always to be misunderstood or misinterpreted—by unofficial communications to the committees themselves, these officers originate, press forward, modify, or entirely defeat measures of legislation.

It is also interesting to note that, at this same period in our history, the Confederate States who were so jealous of the law-making rights of States that they were willing to go to war over it, and who would not knowingly or willingly expand the Federal Government in any of its departments beyond the absolute necessities of the case, provided in their own constitution for the admission of cabinet members into the deliberations of their house and senate.

Obviously, then, from the intent of the farmers of the law itself, from the historical development of English parliamentary government, from our own experience and the experience of all other governments that have adopted this cooperative method of government between the legislative and executive departments, there is not a thread upon which any substantial fear of executive encroachment can be hung. This measure is designed to do the one thing that our constitutional fathers held constantly in their minds—the maintenance of a balance between the three departments of government. This is the one method that will enable the Legislature to exercise that control which our modern industrial development has made necessary in the Executive.

The only control that Congress has at the present time over Executive conduct is the interminable, tiresome, and usually futile congressional investigation, with its reams of testimony, expensive junketing trips, loads of newspaper publicity, and usually a dud at the end. President Grant's 8 hectic years brought forth 37 such investigations. President McKinley beat Congress to the punch at the close of the Spanish-American War by appointing his own commission to tell the world all about the embalmed beef; sinking transports, and utter lack of military supplies. The congressional investigation of the controversy between Gifford Pinchot and Secretary Ballinger in the administration of President Taft is still ripe in the memory of most of us. The odoriferous scandals of the Harding administration were all brought to light by congressional investigation. Practically all of this could have been avoided if Congress had been in a position to demand in the public interest constant information from members of the Cabinet as to what they were doing and why they were doing it.

Yet the executive department would also be in a much greater position to work efficiently. It could inject its opinion on national questions in the same forum in which those opinions are attacked—on the floor of the House of Representatives. It could supply Congress with facts and information known only to the executive department, which would save a lot of useless oratory and a lot of misinformation. In short, it could give to Congress a leadership in the national interest.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] in his remarks says that Congress already has plenty of leadership, and he fortifies that statement by naming a number of illustrious leaders of Congress who have served in times past. It was never my intention to say that Congress has not had leadership. We have had many patriotic men in these Halls, but in every case they were elected from congressional districts. They either voted and talked as the majority in their districts required or they were not reelected to Congress. If such leadership happened to be in the national interest, it was due to the fortuitous circumstance that a man of exceptional ability happened to come from a district that had the national viewpoint rather than a sectional one. The purpose of bringing Cabinet members on the floor of the House is to give the only public official that is elected by all the people | of the United States, the President, power to exert leadership over Congress at all times from a national viewpoint; not by the accident of circumstance but as a system of

The overwhelming preponderance of opinion of our real students of government endorse such a bill as now pending before our Judiciary Committee. In my former talk I set forth the personnel of the senatorial committee that had given unanimous approval of this measure, a committee which for high standing of scholarship and public service would be very hard to duplicate in our history. It contained such names as James G. Blaine, George Pendleton, General Butler, John G. Ingalls, and others of almost equal standing.

In giving the list of authorities approving this proposition, we must ever keep in mind the name of our own colleague the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. A. J. Montague, who is probably the best informed man in the country on the development of this whole problem and the necessity of this reform. A number of years ago he gave an address before the Pennsylvania Bar Association on this subject, which is so scholarly and complete that it leaves very little to be said.

One of the salient points of that address is that secret Cabinet meetings, combined with secret committee meetings in Congress, tend to destroy that public interest which is vital to a democracy. This system makes for an overactivity of politicians and an indifference in general by the people to problems of government. Both of these evils would be largely overcome by the public appearance of Cabinet members and the open discussion of their views.

Prof. Harold J. Laski, in Harper's Monthly for June of 1928, heartily endorses this proposal and says:

The habit of debate in the House of Representatives would be The habit of debate in the House of Representatives would be restored, and with its restoration there would be both an increase in the significance of opposition and a growth of public interest in the process of politics. A Secretary charged with corruption, like Mr. Daugherty or Mr. Fall, would have to meet his accusers face to face, a fact which would, at a stroke, raise the level of political morality in America.

Charles G. Fenwick, of Bryn Mawr College, writes in the American Political Science Review for November 1920 a similar endorsement. Hon. Perry Belmont, at one time Chairman of our Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, writes in the Constitutional Review of July 1928 a very scholarly review of the whole subject, and in that article quotes a conversation which he has had with Hon. Elihu Root, our present representative on the World Court and a man described by President Theodore Roosevelt as the greatest statesman in the world. Mr. Root is quoted

I have long been of the opinion that it would improve the conduct of both the legislative and executive business of the Government to have the heads of the executive department entitled to seats in the House of Congress with the right to be heard and the duty to give information under appropriate regulation.

Mr. Belmont also quotes Mr. John W. Davis, our Democratic candidate for President in 1924, as being favorable to Cabinet participation.

Dr. Charles A. Beard, the author of The Rise of American Civilization, and probably our outstanding student of governmental problems, in an article in Harper's for July 1930,

This (requiring Cabinet members to attend Congress) should have a wholesome influence on both departments of Government. Again and again Congress enacts laws in vague and general terms, leaving interpretation and application to Executive authority. The Water Power Act of 1920 and the Boulder Dam Act of more recent fame are excellent examples. In such cases it frequently happens that the administration departs, or seems to depart, widely from the intention of the legislature, assuming that it was ever clearly formulated. The Members of Congress attack the administration on the floor and the administration fires volleys through the press at Members of Congress. Not an edifying spectacle. Worse than at Members of Congress. Not an edifying spectacle. Worse than that, it delays, confuses, and hampers the transaction of business. Every issue of this character should be defined on the floor of Congress, with the parties in interest face to face, the press watching and the country informed.

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, by very clear inference approves of such a system, and in section 869 bemoans the secrecy in relationship between executive and legislative branches of the Government.

President Woodrow Wilson, in an article on the subject,

The degree of separation now existing between the executive and legislative branches cannot long be preserved without very serious consequences resulting. Congress and the President now treat each other as almost separate governments, so jealous is each of its prerogative. What we need is harmonious, consistent party governments, and the party governments is the party governments. ment instead of a wide dispersion of function and responsibility. We can get it only by connecting the President closely, as closely as may be, with his party in Congress. The natural connecting link is the Cabinet.

Hon. William C. Redfield, after his retirement as Secretary of Commerce in 1919, issued a book entitled "With Congress and Cabinet." He says on page 42:

The weakness of the House as a working part of the Government is insufficient knowledge of economics and of the Government itself. * * * The Halls of Congress are not a source of accurate knowledge concerning the Government.

His solution of the problem was to have Under Secretaries from the executive departments present in Congress at all times.

Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes, who was then Secretary of State, in an address in Albany, N. Y., in 1924, said:

It ought to be possible for Cabinet officers to take part in the debates in both Houses on matters touching their department and thus be able to give exact information and to defend themselves against unjust attacks. * * * Under the present arrangement against unjust attacks. * * * Under the present arrangement a Cabinet officer often hears of misunderstandings and of an outpouring of mistaken notions which a brief statement from him could have corrected, but the misapprehension has been voiced and has gone through the country perhaps never to be overtaken.

The force of Chief Justice Hughes' remarks was impressed upon me this afternoon as I listened to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber] discuss the financial condition of the country when he insisted on listing all of the money that the Federal Government has advanced in the form of loans to the States, cities, and home owners of this country as being Federal expenditures. Continuing, Justice Hughes said:

We can preserve the advantages of stability and enhance the opportunity of Executive leadership, not by overriding the cherished prerogatives of the Congress or by attempting to gain an illicit advantage for that leadership but by having a recognized contact through the regular admission of Cabinet officers to the floor of both Houses of Congress.

Hon. James A. Garfield, later a President of the United States, speaking of the same proposal before Congress, said:

Who does not know that the enactment of this law will tend to bring our ablest men into the Cabinet of the Republic? Who does not know that if a man is to be responsible to his executive does not know that if a man is to be responsible to his executive acts and also be able to tell why he proposes new measures, and to comprehend intelligently the whole scope of his duties, weak men will shrink from taking such places? Who does not know that it will call out the best talent of the land both executive and parliamentary? * * * It is the silent, secret influence that saps and undermines the fabric of republics, and not the proposed the collision between intellects the array of facts. open appeal, the collision between intellects, the array of facts. I hope that this measure will be fairly considered. If it does not pass now, the day will come, I believe, when it will pass. When pass now, the day will come, I believe, when it will pass. When that day comes I expect to see a higher type of American statesmanship, not only in the Cabinet, but in the legislative halls.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for one question.

Mr. MAY. In view of the fact that the framers of the Constitution provided for absolute divorcement of the three departments of government, each from the other, and particularly the executive from the legislative, has the gentleman considered the possibility of entangling the executive and legislative branches of the Government by his bill?

Mr. HARLAN. I may say to the gentleman that I will include in my remarks, which I did not intend to do, a statement by James Madison appearing in the Federalist, answering an article by Montesquieu on the question of separation of departments of government:

He (Montesquieu) did not mean that the departments should have no partial agency in the acts of each other. His meaning can amount to no more than this: That where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department, the fundamental principles of a free constitution are subverted. Former President Taft, in his message to Congress on December 19, 1912, forcibly recommended the adoption of a bill permitting and requiring Cabinet members to participate in legislative matters. In this message he says:

There has been much lost motion in the machinery due to the lack of cooperation and interchange of views face to face between the representatives of the Executive and the Members of the two legislative branches of the Government. It was never intended that they should be separated in the sense of not being in constant effective touch and relationship to each other. The legislative and Executive each perform its own appropriation function, but these functions must be coordinated. * * * I do not think that I am mistaken in saying that the presence of the members of the Cabinet on the floor of each House would greatly contribute to the enactment of beneficial legislation.

Thus we have seen the measure which is now pending to require Cabinet members to enlarge their functions and cooperate with the legislative branch endorsed by the history of the British Empire in its struggle to achieve democratic government. We have seen this experience copied to greater or less degrees by almost all of the later republics, both European and American. We have seen in America an irresistible growth of Executive power, with no apparent instrumentality to control that power on the part of the legislature. We have seen our thinking students of government try to devise a means of working out of this dilemma, and out of this effort-70 years-the first bill to establish cooperation between the Cabinet and the legislature was initiated. That bill has been endorsed by our outstanding students of government everywhere. It has met the express approval of at least three of our Presidents, of a senatorial committee of outstanding ability, of two of our Chief Justices of the Supreme Court, and of our representative on the World Court. Yet we must not proceed in haste, as we are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who says that the bill will dangerously increase executive power, while we are also warned by a former Secretary of the Treasury that it will so irritate the legislature that it will be a futility. The choice between these viewpoints is now in our hands, and as one Member of this body I recommend the passage of the bill by this House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Castellow].

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to consume any time on this occasion, but, having listened to interesting talks this morning by several distinguished Members of this House, I feel inclined at least to interpose a few comments.

I was especially interested in the discourse of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Mansfield] in the beginning of the debate. He gave us some very interesting information in reference to the cotton situation in the South. The lesson that I drew from his statistics inclines me to make this suggestion. It is now high time that we as a people decide whether we are to be nationalistic and self-contained or remain a factor in the commerce of the world.

If we expect to deal in the markets of the world, it follows necessarily that we must put ourselves in position to compete with others who are dealing in that same market. The gentleman has shown us that while the cotton production of this country decreased last year some 3,000,000 bales, there was a corresponding increase in the production of other countries. Consequently, the world supply was not reduced. If we expect to sell cotton in the markets of the world, necessarily we are going to be compelled, whether we would like it or not, to be in position to compete with those countries that produce the same commodity. This is not only true in the production of cotton, but it is likewise true in the production of any commodity that is to be placed on the counters of the world and offered for barter.

As I have remarked before upon the floor of the House, there is an absolutely logical reason for everything which has transpired or ever will. Why is it that the wealth of the United States, and I might say the wealth of the world, is centered in that part of the country which is intrinsically the poorest part of the United States—I will not say of the world? Why is it that the southern part of the United States, rich in soil, with a wonderful climate, possesses a negligible portion of the wealth of the United States, while that part of the country inhabited by those we call New Englanders possesses so much of the wealth of the world? There is a reason, an absolutely valid reason, for it. One is that by the decree of Nature men prosper, not when helped but when they rise to meet emergencies and overcome difficulties. They evidently were using their brain while we probably were enjoying our climate.

Until recently, as I understand, the chief difference between the doctrines of the Republican Party and those of the Democratic Party was upon the subject of tariffs. The people of the Democratic Party, the nucleus of which, of course, remains in the South, stood for low tariffs or no tariffs, while the people of the North and the East stood for high tariffs and protective tariffs. Now, what transpired? What was the tragical result of this difference of opinion in regard to the policies which should be enacted into law?

The situation might be illustrated with a game of baseball, for instance, between New York and Washington. The umpire calls into consultation the captains of these teams, and he says to the Washington captain, "Mr. Captain, how many strikes do you say a batter should have before he is out?" And the captain promptly responds, "Three."

He then asks the captain of the New Yorkers, "How many strikes do you contend a batter should have before he is out?" And the captain of the New York team replies, "I think he should have five. Now, what is your decision, Mr. Umpire?" The umpire responds, "Well, I am thoroughly agreeable. I like to please all, so I am going to agree with both you gentlemen. Each batter of the Washington team will be allowed three strikes before he is out; each batter of the New York team will be permitted five strikes before he is out. The game is called!"

The United States has said time and again, "I am going to agree with the Democrats of the South, and I am going to agree with the Republicans of the North and the East; I am going to give you people of the South what you want, a low tariff or no tariff, and I am going to give the people of the North and the East what they want, a high tariff, a protective tariff", thereby forcing the agricultural classes to sell the products of their labor in an open market in competition with the world, and to buy their necessities in a market inflated by a high protective tariff.

We have operated under those rules for 150 years; and is it surprising that we of the South have not won a game yet? [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I am not saying that we are more virtuous than you, and I would be far from admitting that you are more virtuous than we.

The question of tariff seems to be largely a question of expediency as it affects the business interests of respective localities, and in its solution the voice of selfishness and self-interest seems to prevail, as is often clearly demonstrated on both sides of this House.

There are many other things that I should like to say, suggested by the splendid speech of my friend from Texas [Mr. Mansfield].

The next speaker was the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber], from the Republican side. I have listened to the gentleman on many occasions, and I say this: that the truth is the truth, not because any particular one speaks it, but because it is the truth, whether it be in Holy Writ or not. If good comes from this side or that side, I for one am willing and anxious to accept it. Mr. Taber was speaking my convictions when he said he believed the time was near at hand, or even now at hand, when we should at least begin to make some effort to balance our Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes additional time to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, there are two words in the English language which, according to my judgment, have caused more bankruptcies and more financial failures in private life than anything else that I can think of, and the principle that applies to private life will apply with equal force to public life, or the life of a State or a municipality. The two words to which I refer are "Charge it." Require a man to pay cash for what he buys, or even if you go further than that and require him to pay in good, new silver dollars, then many a time he will put the dollars back in his pocket and not buy something which he fancied he needed but in reality did not need, or at least could do without. I have considered the Committee on Ways and Means, that is charged with the duty of getting up the money to meet these great expenditures which we are making and have been making.

I deeply sympathize with those gentlemen when the time arrives for them to raise by taxation adequate funds to meet resulting demands upon the Federal Treasury. When this time does arrive, I fear they will become the most unpopular committee, not only in this Congress, but that has ever served in any Congress in the history of the country. I believe further that the committee that is charged with the duty of raising the revenue should have some voice in directing how it should be expended, and I furthermore submit that it would be most expedient, and more in keeping with business principles, to provide the funds before the various appropriations are made. I have never known an individual to achieve much success who contracted obligations before the formation of definite plans whereby they were to be met. If you will determine in advance what funds can be supplied-and before any appropriations are made-in my judgment, the results in the end will be much more satisfactory.

I never did think it was right for the old man, the head of the family, to have to raise and make the money, and have the children, who make nothing, do all of the spending and saying how much. [Applause and laughter.] It never impressed me as good business, and neither do I think it honest.

Next is the question of the tariff. That is a big question. It takes lots of time to discuss it. I never did want to start talking here unless I had at least 2 hours, but rather than have a row with my good friend Mr. Taylor, I accepted what he said he could give me, 10 minutes, although I cannot get started in that length of time, particularly upon such a controversial subject.

It has occurred to me that there was much wisdom in the thought suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sumners] during the last Congress, that we often give too much consideration to the garment in which the thought is to be clothed, rather than to the substance of the thought itself. If we would simply express ourselves with more ease and reason together as men, I believe the aggregate results would be much more satisfactory. I was interested a day or two ago when Mr. Marvin Jones used an illustration of the automobile—and I approve of it very much, because I used it in my first campaign some years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. CASTELLOW. I shall keep on talking, Brother Tay-LOR, just as long as you give me time. I have something to say which I think of real worth, and you yourself might think more of it tomorrow than you do today, if you will give it consideration during the night.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman desire 5 minutes more?

Mr. CASTELLOW. Yes; although 55 minutes would be

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I shall have to limit the gentleman to 5 minutes.

Mr. CASTELLOW. I thank the gentleman very much. Small favors are gratefully received. What Mr. Jones said of the automobile is one of the illustrations that I used in my campaign, as I said. I remarked to my people that I had never seen the Congress in session but that I was convinced if the 435 Representatives constituting its membership would thoughtfully cooperate in an honest effort to relieve the distressing situation, gratifying results would be accomplished.

I asked them to think of the old machine, with its rattling chains and lever control, that Dr. Patterson, of Cuthbert, operated with difficulty but a fixed determination to find something speedier than the horse. It is indeed a fossil now as compared with our splendid machines of today, but it was up-to-date at that time. Consider now the marvelous product of mechanical skill, so much in evidence on every hand, which the greatest mechanic ever employed by Henry Ford or Walter Chrysler, or any other since time began, could never alone have produced, for it represents the contributions of hundreds and thousands of honest and earnest men, not one of whom could have built anything approximating it. It represents the combined thoughts of many. Then, I said, why cannot our Representatives in Congress devote themselves in a practical way—as have our mechanics, who are not lawyers, business men, or bankers-and give us something in the way of a governmental machine which will approximate in efficiency that these mechanics have accomplished in their field?

I believe they could. Just at this point, and speaking about what we have done with machinery, that is largely the trouble with our situation today. We have done so much more in a mechanical way, and machinery has been developed so much more rapidly than we have mentally, that matter has exceeded and seems now to excel what we are pleased to term "brains." Beyond question, I fear, we have not the ability or capacity to cope with the situation which it has produced.

According to my judgment, there are five fundamental causes for the conditions which came upon us in 1929 and have followed since. I arrived at these conclusions prior to my entry into the Congress, and in discussing the situation with my people enumerated them as follows:

First. An inequitable distribution of governmental burdens and an unwarranted tax upon our people by governmental expenditures, which at that time were estimated by the President as being $13,000,000,000 levied by National, State, and local Governments. But that is one of the smallest of the five.

Second. The alienation of our foreign trade by unwise tariff legislation.

Third. A dissipation of American wealth by unwise investments in foreign securities.

Fourth, and by far the most important of the five, I believe, is the marvelous increase in labor-saving devices, without due regard to the laborers displaced, thereby increasing and multiplying the ranks of the unemployed.

Fifth. The tremendous increase in our obligations to pay a multitude of debts with a handful of money. And I now submit that practically all of our remedial legislation has been to correct some one of these fundamental difficulties. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Castellow] has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is a joy indeed to hear from the State of Georgia. October 4 last we heard the views of its Democratic State Convention. I have the platform here. It repudiated everything in the new deal, and it would be a good thing for this House if somebody from the State of Georgia would read to us the keynote speech made at that time. We Republicans could subscribe to that platform. For the encouragement of the State of Georgia, and for the encouragement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who has just spoken, it seems that this spending of huge sums of money, which is such a delight to politicians, is now meeting with something in the nature of a set-back. It reminds me of the attractive young lady cashier, about whom I read the other day, who said to her boss that she would have to take a holiday; that she was not looking her best. He said, "Nonsense." "Oh, yes", she said, "I am sure it is necessary. The men are beginning to count their change." [Laughter.]

I think the indications are that we are beginning to count the cost of government. Let me read to you the following:

Our Federal extravagance and improvidence bears a double evil. First, our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation. Second, our credit structure is impaired by the unorthodox Federal financing made necessary by the magnitude of these deficits. The latter is more technical but to my mind the more dangerous. The truth is that our banks are financing these stupendous deficits and that the burden is absorbing their resources. All this is highly undesirable and wholly unnecessary. It arises from one cause only and that is an unbalanced Budget and the continued failure of this administration to take effective steps to balance it.

From President Roosevelt's preelection speech in 1932.

This House ought to be treated to a reading of many of those preelection speeches. The Republicans here could well endorse now practically all of those preelection doctrines, in the light of what has happened since March 4. 1933.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose particularly in defense of New England. I am proud to do it. Even if our recreational. fishing, and textile industries were suffering severely, Massachusetts paid more in percentage than any of the other States for relief of her people. She stands high in that regard, but we shall be obliged to continue to help pay, for years and years to come, the 99 percent of the relief bills of certain of the other States. So that I feel, under such conditions, that we may justly appeal for assistance for our industries. We were told a day or two ago, when our New England governors came to Washington-all of them or their representatives-that everything they desired by way of legislation had been delegated by Congress to the President of the United States. "Appeal to him." So, after all, these speeches made upon the floor of this House seem to be of little avail.

In fairness, I want to say, relating to the processing tax, about which we have, today and recently, heard so much, that the doctrine of "reward the farmer for not raising cotton; penalize the mills for manufacturing cotton" is certainly not working out as planned. Scarcity and high prices are what this administration seems to desire to bring about in order to restore prosperity. "Reward the cotton farmers for not raising cotton; penalize the mills for manufacturing it." This pithy expression was recently uttered by one of our manufacturers, and it is worth repeating here.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield, if the gentleman is willing to reward my fishermen for not catching fish.

Mr. FORD of California. I am not a miracle worker, and I could not do that, but I would ask the gentleman this: How many of his customers for textiles are farmers, and is not the processing tax giving those farmers the money to purchase the gentleman's textiles?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; and right along that line I think I can please the gentleman when I can say, unlike other New England Congressmen, I acknowledged, when we passed the processing tax, that the consumer would have to pay it, and that the farmer would not benefit at the expense of the manufacturer, who would simply pass it on, if possible. That was the theory advanced.

In practice, however, our mills have been forced to absorb this tax, which was not the intention. The idea behind it might have been good. I have often remarked that if Massachusetts were to say that her textile plants pay this processing tax, then North Carolina could well say that they pay the tobacco tax; but she does not. A stamp is placed on every package of tobacco that is sold. Why can we not devise some sort of stamp to be placed on the manufactured article when it is sold so that everybody may know that the consumer is paying the tax? It was asserted that our people were buying cotton products altogether too cheaply. But in this effort to try to absorb the processing tax and meet competition there has been a direful effect on the textile mills.

Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly understand how difficult it is for us to get sympathy in such a matter; how difficult it is to overcome sectionalism. Every time I bring this up someone will take me by the arm confidentially and say: "Well, after all, the textile mills of the North are poorly located and you have got to come down South, have you not, where labor is more orderly and where the raw product is right at hand." New England is perhaps fighting a hard fight with that viewpoint so clearly in the minds of the majority party. But does the cotton producer want the processing tax and all else besides? I am appealing today that some sentiment may be aroused in the sunny South for New England. It has that God-given chance to raise the cotton, and all her acres are profitable, to some extent at least. I am hoping that some day you will have the buying power down there; but it will come only when you pay your workers a reasonable wage and when you give them better living conditions. How do I know? I went down there to see; and I think I understand the present unfair conditions existing there. I would like to record at this particular moment one answer I got to the question "How can the southern mills make money?" The reply was: "We have no idle machinery; the wheels turn 24 hours a day."

We have overcome that to some extent, under the N. R. A.; we have forced certain sections of the country to come under a minimum wage with the differential of $1; but the textile industries are claiming that now much more of this nature should be added to the N. R. A.; and are appealing to the President. We cannot appeal here except to arouse your interest, sentiment, and sympathy. Why should they pay practically all workers, including the semiskilled only the minimum wages paid in other sections of the country. Why? Cannot the N. R. A., as demanded by labor, impose a real code of fair competition? That is the intent of it.

Now, let us have these semiskilled and skilled workers put into three or four separate classes, and whether in one section of the country or in another have the workers paid the same. That is the only thing that will add to your purchasing power. Our New England textile mills are in a precarious condition. We have a right to appeal to the Congress, or to the President, if necessary. We have contributed much toward the wealth of this country. Processing taxes must be rearranged as far as this maladjustment occurs; the South must forego the advantage, if you please, of low labor costs and by some method be forced to recognize fair competition. This is a reasonable request.

This afternoon, while we have plenty of opportunity to discuss matters, I wish to follow up my suggestion to the gentleman from California. Can you imagine any industry worse off than the fishing industry? Do you need to be told what an important industry it is, particularly now that food prices, meat prices, are going up, and the slogan has got to be, "Eat more fish"? Were I to portray to you the fisherman's life and the hardships he has to endure, it would be a tale the like of which you have never heard connected with any other industry. Why not now give him the benefits of a processing tax and pay him something for not catching fish? He is asking his Congressmen for assistance such as is given the farmers, and we can only say, "Yes; we know we are your Congressmen, but under conditions existing here we are absolutely helpless."

They ask, "Can you not prevent that trade pact with Canada?"

And we must answer, "No; we handed all the power to the President. On the floor of Congress we may be able to appeal for sympathy and to enlist sympathy, but we are shorn of power to aid our constituents in almost all matters on which they appeal to us. I, with other Congressmen, can get up on the floor and make speeches, just speeches to be read at home; but we experience only the weariness of futility."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do hope that sometime this government of trial by error shall cease. In closing, I would like to add a little pleasantry, as I did in the beginning, for so many people have been confused about a government of trial by error. When you are explaining it, to women's clubs especially, tell them a government of trial by error is like this: A lady told her maid to give the baby a bath and put the thermometer in the water to see that its temperature was just right.

The maid replied: "I do not need to. I put the baby in the bath, and if the water is too hot he turns red, and if it is too cold he turns blue, and I can tell."

Everything is turning red or turning blue. Let us get back to the thermometers, the barometers, and to old-fashioned experience, just as Georgia demands. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. CRAWFORD. I am very much interested in what the gentleman had to say in reference to the scarcity of production. If I remember correctly, the other day someone from Ohio made the statement on the floor to the effect that wages are paid from profit. May I ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, that statement is true, or is it a fact that wages are paid from production?

Mr. GIFFORD. The wages of the textile mills since 1925 have been paid from profits made theretofore. Many of the stockholders of the mills that have been hanging on since 1925 now say. "Let us salvage the ship. Let us get anything we can for our share of stock. We have been patriotic long enough." Our mills are now being dismantled and whatever may be left within them is being sold-auctioned off to get what little they can out of the wreck.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that I have not more time than has been allotted to me this afternoon, as I should like to discuss in detail the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, which is now on the Union Calendar. This committee completed an investigation on behalf of the Congress dealing with subversive activities by the nationals of foreign governments. The committee made great progress, and, in my opinion, presented a great report.

However, I should have liked to have the report go further and make additional recommendations.

Mr. Chairman. I should like to have had additional discussion in detail concerning certain activities of the Nazi government in this country.

I would have condemned the Ambassador from Germany for his activities in the United States in a dual capacity: He represented the German Government here as an Ambassador, and at the same time he was very active in spreading propaganda within the borders of the United States. I hope that at some future time I will have the opportunity to further discuss that question.

Several times during the progress of hearings before the committee Ambassador Luther's name and the German Embassy were brought into prominence and the evidence definitely indicated that he has been acting unjustly toward our people, in that while serving in his official capacity he also represented and gave comfort to groups in this country which were affiliated with a political party of a foreign government and which endeavored to instill in the minds of American citizens the pernicious racial and religious animosities which dominate that foreign political party. Naturally, Ambassador Luther had the opportunity through regular channels to deny these charges, but he did not do so; he probably claims diplomatic immunity.

I should have liked to have taken a number of the consuls representing the German Government and sent them right back home, because, Mr. Chairman, our United States consuls would not dare do abroad what these men have done in this country. The committee found that some of these consuls have dished out thousands upon thousands of dollars in cash to pay propaganda agents and secret spies to strike at the very things that we cherish and which are the very fundamentals of our Government. On the Nazi activities I intend to extend my remarks.

The committee has discovered instance upon instance where German consuls in this country assisted in the printing and the spreading throughout the United States of propaganda designed to aline American against American on subjects contrary to the principles of this Government, and that they were a party to the disbursement of funds to carry on this work directly from the German consulates. Most of this money was paid in cash, the purpose being to prevent, and so far as possible, make impossible, the discovery of this financial tie-up; but your committee was able, by very careful examination to uncover these facts by documentary evidence and sworn statements. The amounts of these transactions, uncovered by your committee, ran into the thousands of dollars, but there is no telling how large the amounts were which the committee was unable to uncover in the limited time at its disposal.

I would here give full credit to the millions of people in this country of German ancestry and of German birth, against whom no charge of any un-American activities has been placed, and who have recognized this investigation was in fact a protection to them against unjust criticisms. I would also give appropriate credit to the many German-Americans who have cooperated with me from the very beginning of my unofficial investigation of these alien Nazi activities, up to the time the investigation was authorized by the House of Representatives, and thereby made official.

When alien leaders come to this country under the pretext of being friendly aliens, when in fact they are leaders in their own countries and come here to cement a feeling among people who came originally from their country, or whose ancestry migrated here from that country, and ask them to subscribe to a principle of foreign philosophy of government which leads to a dictatorship and can only have the effect of arousing animosity between American citizens and residents, then I say, that alien leaders of that type are not fit to remain here or to become citizens of the United States. Furthermore, when these alien leaders secure the cooperation of any Americans and by their combined efforts endeavor to inspire our people to act against the interests of the United States through groups controlled by aliens for the purpose of attacking the Government or our people with direct and indirect subsidies paid by the Nazi government which was discovered as beyond dispute and beyond question, then it is time for our Government to call a stop to these activities.

It is not my purpose or intention to advocate the destruction of free speech, free press, or free assembly, but the principle of free speech, free press, or free assembly does not mean the smuggling into our borders of propaganda, which if read, would bring about intolerance, bigotry, religious and racial hatred among our own people. Nor does it mean the smuggling of ammunition, nor the smuggling of uniforms, nor the receiving of orders from foreign dictators, brought in by these aliens for the purpose of educating American people regarding their conduct here or the form of government we should have. Free speech does not mean that the Nazi Party of Germany can threaten American citizens of German birth in an effort to secure them to subscribe to the principles of the National Socialist Labor Party, when those principles require you to be of Aryan blood, forbid your being a Mason or a member of any other fraternal order, and demand that you cannot be a Jew. These principles of free speech, free press, and free assembly, as we understand them, do not require us to subscribe to the principles of these alien leaders under the threat of violence or, if in business, boycott, should the demands of these alien propagandists on behalf of foreign governments be rejected.

Free speech and free assembly do not mean that these Nazi groups shall have the inalienable right to hold secret meetings, pledge allegiance to carry out their pernicious propaganda against our form of government and against our people, to conspire with one another to bring about force and violence and disrepute among the people of this country, to conduct parties on German boats to which are invited innocent victims of American birth who believe they are going there for the purpose of seeing a program of development, only to find that they are taught by Nazi leaders to believe the principle that Hitler rules the earth. Free speech, free press, and free assembly do not authorize the conducting of un-American schools and un-American youth camps, whether Nazi or Communist, to teach everything that is foreign and un-American—everything that our people will not tolerate, and do not mean the license to deliberately endeavor to destroy every beautiful doctrine that our forefathers died and bled for in their efforts to establish and preserve this Nation. However, these principles have been used as a license rather than a privilege, and have been practiced all over the country by local groups of the Friends of the New Germany, which is the American organization representing the National Socialist Labor Party in Germany.

This organization, the Friends of the New Germany, which is a foreign group, under the leadership of unnaturalized aliens, has been properly declared an un-American group by the Supreme Court of the State of New York when they requested a charter of corporation and same was denied.

Now then, how can the leaders and members of this organization justify their parades with the swastika flag at the head, the use of foreign uniforms, carrying guns, marching along while they sing the national anthem of the National Socialist Labor Party of Germany. People of this type, in my opinion, are not fit to be American citizens or enjoy the privileges of this country.

As I have indicated above, I am in accord with the report of the committee but would have liked to have seen it go a little bit further. I would have recommended that it be made a violation of the criminal statutes for any foreign group to import and wear uniforms while conducting their foreign propaganda; I would have recommended that it be a crime for steamship companies, other companies, or individuals to deliberately and intentionally smuggle these uniforms into the country for propaganda purposes; I would have recommended also that the citizenship be terminated in the case of every individual who holds American citizenship and foreign allegiance in a dual capacity; I would have recommended the making of some specific charge against foreign governments who endeavor to spread propaganda inimical to our country and our people, and who set up machinery of propaganda and appropriate money therefor with the intention that it be used in the United States to spread their foreign ideals.

I have every regard for an alien who comes here for the purpose of making this country his home, and I say that we shall provide him with the means of earning a living; we should facilitate his efforts to become assimilated in our American life; we should give him proper protection while he is here—but in return I would expect such aliens to be law abiding, to help us in our efforts to effect their assimilation, to help us in our own program, to advance American ideals of thought, teachings, and government. But whenever any alien comes here for the sole purpose of doing injustice to his fellow men and seeks through the agency of foreign origin to bring about this discontent, slander, unrest, and intolerance among the people of his adopted country, I say that such an alien does not deserve the protection and opportunities which this country affords, and should be sent back home.

Evidence received by the committee indicated that every industry in Germany is today under the control of the German Government. The Government has confiscated industry, especially in the larger brackets of activity, and although on the surface it may appear that they are conducting their individual businesses, nevertheless the committee has found that the German Dye Trust, German steamship companies, and many other larger industries are absolutely under the direct control of the German Government.

It developed that when Ivy Lee entered into his contract with the German Dye Trust for the purpose of advising them, on the surface this information was intended for that industry; but Ivy Lee told your committee that he felt certain the information was reaching Government officials; and it is needless to say that the German Government evidently had something to do with the $25,000 fee which Ivy Lee received for each year during the life of the contract. It is a peculiar circumstance that one of Mr. Lee's sons was taken to Germany by Mr. Lee and by him left in Germany as his contact man at an annual salary of $33,000, although Mr. Lee testified that they had no business in Germany other than the matter pertaining to the contract between himself and the German Dye Trust.

Another organization in this country about which the committee received information in this propaganda work directed through German railroads and German tourists' bureaus was the organization known as "Carl Byoir and Associates." One of the associates, Mr. Dickey, was subpenaed and was examined by me in executive session and also by the committee in public session, at which time Carl Byoir was in Europe. In this connection I should like to say to you that a great deal of credit is due Mr. Carl Byoir, the head of this firm, who upon his return from abroad gave evidence of his outstanding character as an American who is in sympathy with the principles of our Government, when he immediately terminated the relationship between his organization and the German Government, and terminated his own relationship, so far as any contract was concerned. between the German Government or any German industry and his concern and also indicated that had he known the facts back of the contract which became the subject of the investigation before this committee, he most certainly would not have permitted his firm to be tied up with it. And in this connection I want to congratulate him for his highminded attitude.

At some future date I should like to discuss more fully the evidence taken by the committee centering around the names of Gen. Smedley D. Butler, Gerald C. Maguire, and Robert Sterling Clark, but it would be useless at this time to connect a number of links, which General Butler complains that we have not done.

General Butler gave his evidence before the committee in executive session and told a most fantastic tale, but a peculiar fact is that the story was substantiated by many documents submitted by General Butler whose sworn statement was received by the committee, less than a month and a half before the life of the committee terminated. The committee proceeded to conduct an investigation in an effort to secure verification of the essential details of his story.

In that effort the committee subpensed Gerald C. Maguire, whose testimony, in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of the entire membership of the committee, from the start was intended to throw a smoke screen over his real activities. During his examination by myself and other members of the committee, he was endeavoring to show that he represented Mr. Clark for the purchase of bonds for which he was given hundreds of thousands of dollars. There is evidence that he never returned a large part of the money placed at his disposal, there was no evidence to show that he actually purchased any bonds for Mr. Clark, and there were strong inferences that it may be assumed that the money was used for improper purposes among certain groups of people in an effort to bring about the adoption by the American Legion convention in Chicago, of certain proposals in which certain individual members of Wall Street are interested, the ulterior motive being that these Wall Street individuals, by securing a hammer-lock, could use these American Legion sponsored measures against the President of the United States as well as against the Congress. In his efforts to cover up the real motives of his activities Maguire seems to have deliberately committed perjury before the committee. in my opinion.

The committee could not have possibly established the conversations which Butler claimed that he had with Clark, since Clark was not available—he was then in Europe, had been some time previous, and still is. However, the committee did examine Mr. Christmas at the very end of the life of the committee as soon as Mr. Christmas had himself returned from Europe, and he gave testimony which clearly indicated that Maguire had not told the committee the whole truth. The committee has gone as far as it possibly could, but if time and money had permitted, it probably could have gone into the Clark tie-up more thoroughly and in greater detail

At this time I just want to extend a word of personal | credit to radio stations WNYC and WNEW and stations affiliated with these two for transmitting over their network one of the public hearings conducted in New York City by this committee, which was heard by many hundreds of people; as a result of that broadcast the committee received much valuable information regarding subversive activities and movements at various places throughout the

Also I wish especially to publicly express appreciation of myself and on behalf of the committee to the Association of the Bar of the City of New York for all of the courtesies they extended to the committee and myself, and for their generous spirit. Their rooms and the facilities of their building and the willing cooperation of their employees were at all times cheerfully made available for executive and public hearings held in New York City.

The committee has gone into the question of fascism extensively, and I will endeavor to discuss this more fully later.

At this time I want to deal with the question of communism. The question, I admit, is a rather broad one. I want to appeal to this House and to the American people that I think it is most essential for the House to continue the life of the committee. I want you to bear in mind that this committee in December 1934, just about a month before our power expired, went into the matter and investigated the whole Communist situation. The report as presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] presents an illustration of the tie-up that exists between the Communist Party of the United States and the Third Internationale in Russia.

Here is just one thing that happened: I subpensed the treasurer of the Communist Party and examined him. had learned there was an awful lot of money coming in, and I was trying to find out the sources of the financial support of the Communist Party. I wanted to find out how they could spread all over our country. They have schools in New York, in Philadelphia, in Chicago, in Boston, in Cleveland, in Los Angeles, in San Francisco, in Washington, and in practically every big city in the United States. Who is financing these schools and who is supporting them?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minne-

Mr. KNUTSON. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact they also conduct summer schools for young boys and young girls who are in their early teens.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is correct.

Mr. Chairman, in one school they have almost 3,000 students who pay practically nothing. These Communists seem to have a lot of parades. In fact, they parade almost every day. They do not want to work, nor do they want to go back to Russia. I have had my own personal experience with them. They have been picketing my house almost daily because they do not want to be deported. They have been making speeches right in front of my nose. They have defied the Government and its laws, and defied the special committee of this House.

I examined the treasurer of the Communist Party and, Mr. Chairman, I asked him to produce the books and records showing their financial transactions. He told me in substance, not in so many words, that he would refuse to produce the books showing the financial resources of the Communist Party. Why? Mr. Chairman, they are just as we are. They sleep with this proposition every night. They knew that Congress was not in session and they found out that we could not bring them before the bar of the House, although the old laws, sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes, states that one is guilty of a misdemeanor when refusing to obey the mandate of a committee of either House of Congress. However, the law says that it must be within the District of Columbia. In other words, they took advantage of an old statute under which we could not compel them to produce anything while Congress was not in session because the examination did not take place in the District of Columbia. So I could not get the books. They defied the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, for this reason alone in the very near future I am going to call upon the Members, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton], to extend the life of this committee so that we may bring these culprits before the bar of justice and make them respect the mandates of this Congress and the last Congress. We have traced hundreds of thousands of dollars, but they refuse to produce the documents because they say: "You are in a new Congress and you cannot bring us before you now."

By direction of the committee, I presented the facts of this matter to the Federal district attorney, in whose jurisdiction this offense was committed by this witness, likewise the counsel for the special committee submitted citations of court decisions on the subject, but we found the committee was unable to bring this contumacious witness before the grand jury in that jurisdiction, nor could we bring him before the bar of the House, since Congress was in recess and would not probably convene again during life of that Congress or during the life of this committee.

I just want to quote from a letter received from the district attorney and received by me on or about October 25

I am obliged to say that after further consideration of section 192 et seq. of title 2, U. S. C., I am still of opinion that section 192 must be read in conjunction with section 194 of the same title, and that reading them together they confer no jurisdiction on the district court of this district to proceed either by information or indistrect expect this without the section of the same time or indistrect the section of th tion or indictment against this witness

So this committee was helpless to compel this witness to produce evidence vitally pertinent to the investigation which the House had directed it to make during the Seventy-third

One of the recommendations made by the committee in the report is that legislation should be enacted to prevent the recurrence of this situation in future investigations ordered by Congress when such examinations are made while Congress is not in session here.

What do you think I found this morning? A fine, young American man came to me this morning for the first time and brought me a certain document showing that the Communist Party is conducting a real theater, with real actors, and all of the plays are based upon communism and are for the purpose of teaching your children and my children the philosophy of communism.

Now, how do they do it? I will show you how keen and smart they are in doing this. They went into Philadelphia a month ago and hired one of the large theaters there. They then accumulated all the Communist forces, including some educators, and each of these Communist groups was given a number of tickets, which were distributed free of charge to small children, to girls and boys, to men and women, and to the unemployed, who came to the theater without paying anything. There was produced the play "Stevedore", a great Communist play, and when you leave the theater they believe you are a converted Communist. Then this troupe of actors, most of whom are Communists, go from one city to another and again distribute thousands of these tickets for nothing and bring poor victims into the theater and produce other plays which would create revolution within the borders of our country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, the time has come when we have got to have a show-down. There are two ways-to the right or to the left-one is just as bad as the other in this case. Either these people are going to subscribe to and comply with our laws and our Constitution or we have got to find some method of getting rid of them.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman may not now know definitely, but is he not of the strong conviction that much of this strong financial support does not come from abroad; but, | perhaps, is supplied here at home?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. For the information of the gentleman, I have a list showing some of the contributors.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman kindly insert that list in his remarks?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am going to insert the names of some of those who have been supporting this theater movement that has been going on in all the large cities and in the congested districts of the country, but bear in mind that if you want to get the crux of the whole situation you have got to give this committee a little more time to go into the matter. We are in position to lay our hands on certain people if we can develop certain facts which we have in our possession, and then we can bring you some real, startling information.

Let me quote to you from the list of organizations which have sponsored this theater movement in Philadelphia: Tuesday evening, December 11, United Workers' Organization; Thursday evening, December 13, United Workers' Organization; Friday evening, December 14, United Workers' Organization.

There is a Communist actors' group known as the "Actors Emergency Committee", or a name very similar to that, and the leader of that group is known to be a very radical Communist, according to my informant.

Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman feel that our recognition of Soviet Russia has had a tendency to further aid in the spreading of such propaganda in this country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I would not want to go that far, but there is some information which I do not think my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], when he examined into this situation, found out about.

There are a number of manufacturing concerns in my city as well as in Philadelphia, and all the other large cities, that, under threat of violence to property and employees, have been coerced. This "left wing" organized themselves into what they call a strong-arm guard, and they come to you, as a manufacturer, and say, "Now, Mr. Jones, or Mr. Smith, your pay roll is $10,000 a week. We assess you 3 percent of that pay roll, in addition to what you pay your employees, for the purpose of unemployment relief." This money does not go to unemployment relief, Mr. Chairman. It goes to spread further the doctrine of intolerance and the doctrine of communism, and if you do not pay it, the first thing you know you are going to have a strike on your hands, and the second thing you know, your property will be destroyed and the stocks of goods or merchandise will be mutilated, and before you know it you are out of business.

We have discovered a lot of bank accounts. The smallest balance in these bank accounts is $40,000. We have discovered about four or five bank accounts that were taking blackmail from a lot of honest business men, and if they had not subscribed to the tax levied upon them by these so-called "left wingers", they would have called a strike and destroyed their property.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman able to state whether Russia is financing this movement in America?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If I could get this treasurer whom we directed to produce certain documents, under a subpena after giving him every opportunity, I could perhaps answer the question. We waited there for almost 8 hours for this man to produce the books that he had seen only that morning. If I could get these books and trace certain information which the committee has, I think I could answer the question and also the question that is in the mind of every Member of this House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Without regard to whether or not financial contributions have been traced—and of course with exist or not, I have no knowledge—but the indisputable fact remains that there is direct continuity between the Third International of Soviet Russia and the Communist Party of the United States. Earl Broder, the leader and head of the Communist Party in the United States, admitted under oath or under affirmation before this committee, that there was direct, political continuity between the party in the United States and the Third International of Soviet Russia.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. The charge is definitely made, I may say to the gentleman who is making this most interesting speech, that the program in Mexico, where doctrines are being inculcated by the Government akin to the Russian doctrine or propaganda, is being financed by the Soviets.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Well, there are some suspicious circumstances, but I would not be prepared at this moment to state whether it is a Communist or any other subversive movement. I want to give them the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities, of which I am also a member—I want to ask the gentleman if there was evidence that Russia had made a substantial contribution to communistic publications in this country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is true; but the main purpose was to produce, from the books of the organizations, the very things that we are all dreaming about, that we are all talking about—and, mind you, there were members of this international group connected with the chairman of the supply system of this country, and we tried to get them but they took the next boat and went out. They are now coming back.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I hold in my hand a clipping from a New York newspaper, which says that there has been a protest filed by the Daughters of the American Revolution in Congress against loans from the F. E. R. A. for summer schools for workers which taught subversive propaganda and activities. That is rather hard to believe, but it appeared in the press, backed up by a responsible organization. The article, supported by an affidavit, claimed that these summer workers' schools trained students to promote a general strike, seize industry, and set up a government of workers as was done in Soviet Russia. Has the gentleman any information of that Mr. DICKSTEIN. No such information at all. We did find back in December that there was one communistic C. C. camp but, by the time we were able to get hold of them on January 2, our time expired.

Mr. FISH. I think it is highly important that you should investigate this statement made in good faith, and find out if any of the F. E. R. A. funds are diverted to teaching communism in the summer schools for workers. It is well known that the libraries in the schools financed by Federal funds are largely made up of communistic literature.

Mr. FENERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. FENERTY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] in his admirable presentation of the eagerness of the Russian agents here to destroy American principles of government has given us food for very serious thought. The gentleman has doubtless heard that communistic groups have distributed pamphlets among workers whose purpose is to cast contempt on our courts, to urge the Communist, when arrested for crime, to refuse to give any information, to "pack" the courtroom with Communist agitators in the hope of intimidating American jurors, and to ridicule the procedure and dignity of American justice as a sham provided to confuse defendants and prevent their acting with any intelligence. These pamphlets refer to American laws against sedition and anarchy as "class laws" forged by the "capitalist state" to suppress innocent sovietizers. arrested Communist is urged to "make capitalism the dethe limited time available they were not, and whether they | fendant and himself the prosecutor" by making a class speech to the courtroom. If the anti-American agitator happens to be an alien, as is so often the case, he is told that deportation is a weapon of the rich to try to weaken the communist class, and so he is directed to refuse to give any information as to the time or place or manner of his entrance into our country. Even demonstrations outside the court toward the end of the trial are recommended to the Communists as a means of terrorizing the courtroom and thus prejudicing the case in favor of the seditionists. Everything that can be urged to destroy respect for America and her institutions is advocated by these professional mischief makers, whose capital is Moscow and whose god is Stalin, the black dictator from Caucasus.

In this regard the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] was absolutely correct when a moment ago he intimated that Communists are active in Mexico. As a matter of fact, the entire Government and its 6-year plan are modeled on Soviet principles. Mexican delegates have been sent to Moscow to study the Russian principles and methods of government. Red Russia has spent $18,000,000 for Communist propaganda in Mexico, in the belief, as Russian representatives in Mexico have admitted to American news correspondents, that once Mexico is Russianized, America is next. A peculiar feature of the situation is that the Calles group now oppressing the Mexican people, out-sovieted the Russians by accounting for only three of the eighteen millions. Is is any wonder that the red czar" of Mexico, Calles, is the third largest depositor in the Bank of England? This Armenian Bolshevist has acquired millions by preaching communism while he plundered the underprivileged workers of the country which he dominates, even though there is some doubt that he is a native. His love for Asiatic ideals and the fact that the circumstances of birth are unknown lend color to the Mexican belief that he is not Mexican at all, but Asiatic.

I need not tell you that the subsidized hirelings representing the Red regime of Mexico in this country will probably deny any connection with the Soviet. They will even deny that there is any persecution of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish faiths in Mexico, despite the testimony of American and other eye witnesses. They say that there has been no oppression in Mexico during the last 20 years, but I can show you photographs of their victims hanging lifeless to the telegraph posts along the railroads. I can show you pictures of the posters made for use in the Socialist schools, containing the Russian symbols, the hammer and scythe, all of them clearly Russian in origin, and it is interesting to Americans that at least one poster picturing a Red soldier sweeping out authority and faith from the country suspiciously represents him with a Japanese cast of countenance. Let the Mexican Ambassador or his consul general in New York or any of the Soviet agents now in this country deny that Russian representatives were lately in Mexico, and I will give them the name of the American gentleman who interviewed these representatives there.

Incidentally, as a word of warning to our own peaceloving people, we should emphasize the danger that exists for such organizations as the Rotary, the Lions, the Spanish-American War Veterans, or others who may be contemplating visits to Red Mexico this year. Apart from the fact that, just as in Russia, such tourists are shown only what the Government wants them to see and are filled with Red propaganda by a governmental group that finds it difficult to conceal its contempt for American gullibility, it should be pointed out that such organizations are not only endangering the lives of their own members but running the risk of embroiling our peace-loving people in the quarrels and bloodshed in Mexico. Already there is revolt against the Communist Government in 12 Mexican States. Travel is unsafe. Warnings have come through American correspondents that the railroad lines into Mexico City from Vera Cruz, Laredo, El Paso, and Mazatlan will be cut. The sovietized government group, already tottering, can continue to enrich themselves at the people's expense only if they can alienate sympathy from the oppressed peons. What better way, they figure, than by having some Americans killed or injured and then placing the blame on the now aroused people? It is an old Mexican custom. Throw blood in the faces of the Americans and blame the people who are attempting to rid themselves of the Calles parasites now living on their substance.

What a sad day it would be for these American organizations if, through lack of knowledge of the real situation, they were to go to Mexico to be wined and dined by the anti-American groups now preaching communism there, only to find that, in good faith and unwittingly, they had become the occasion of shedding more American blood on the sands of Mexico. The Red frontier is not now in Europe; it is at our own door. Americans should not be fooled into visiting and encouraging a system which hopes soon to destroy American traditions and reduce our own land to Red reversalism.

The gentleman from New York probably has these facts at his fingers' ends. He and his committee are doing a laudable work that deserves the support and hearty commendation of all patriotic citizens. I hope the committee is given whatever help it requires from the Members of this House.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is correct. Now, this is not because the committee wants to take on any more work. I think we have done more work now than this Congress can appropriate money for. We have not had sufficient money to cover the scope of these subversive movements in this country. I do not care what other governments want. My argument, and the committee's purpose, is to let them keep their propaganda in their own country. We want no part of it in this country.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Did the gentleman find any of these activities in the smaller towns and rural communities?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Oh, that is their meat. They delight in the rural towns, because they create a religious hatred amongst neighbors. They distribute certain documents which bring in the religious question. Some of these people in these small communities have no radio, some do not get many newspapers, and they almost believe the things they read in those documents. The letters that the committee received, and which I received personally, show that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. As a teacher of 25 years' experience in Maine, and a graduate of Bolton College, I ask the gentleman whether it is true, as we read in the Hearst papers, which I am beginning to enjoy very much, that many of the professors of our so-called "high-toned colleges" are going to Russia, or going to Soviet schools the coming summer, and are being financed by us Democrats and Republicans in America?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I cannot answer the question directly, but I can give the gentleman some information along that line. The German Government, as was shown in the Nazi investigation, obtained a number of professors and "brain trust" men to go to Germany for the purpose of coming back and saying wonderful things about Hitler and his regime, and the Fascist government in Italy is taking American children over to that country to study fascism.

Information came to the committee, too late for a thorough investigation, which seemed to indicate that American-born children of Italian parents were taken from the American schoolrooms back to Italy at the expense of the Italian Government for training and practice of the Fascist principles and when these children arrived back in their home town here in America they were met at the train by members of the staff of the Italian consulate at that place and everybody was greeted with an approved Fascist salute.

Also, that the chief of propaganda for the Mussolini government for foreign countries came to America to spread his philosophy of government, and he succeeded in throwing such a smoke screen about his real purposes that he was apparently given a clean bill of health by our own officials, notwithstanding a most earnest request was filed with some authorities for his removal or the curtailment of his subversive activities among our citizens of Italian extraction.

Children right here in Washington-the Capital of this Nation—have been pictured in the public press wearing the uniform of the Italian Youth Movement at a function of some sort held in one of the city high schools.

However, all of this information about the Italian Fascist activities has not been authenticated by an investigation by this committee. The fact that it did reach the committee very late from unorganized groups of American citizens of Italian extraction warrants the belief that startling things might be disclosed should this committee be given added time for a thorough investigation of the facts before it now on this subject. So it will be seen they all have some sort of an in and out, and if we can get to the bottom of it, with the power of this Congress, I think we will solve the problem.

Just now the important thing is for this House to extend the life of this special committee, with additional funds at its disposal, in order that the facts already found out may be further looked into. The origin of all this propaganda must be found, and the source of all this foreign money for the spread of this propaganda in this country should be discovered and stopped, and there are other facts which this Congress should have for the purpose of intelligently correcting the evils, so far as they can be remedied by legislation. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Knurson].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, of course, with ten or eleven million people out of work in this country, it is to be expected that this should be fertile ground for any troublemaker to sow his seed, whether he be Communist. Socialist, or what not. We can legislate and appoint committees to investigate the activities of these perversive organizations that are seeking to undermine our institutions, but it is not going to do much good until we have restored prosperity in our country. When people are hungry and idle they are not much concerned about the Constitution.

We are not going to restore prosperity in this country until we stop these enormous imports which are coming in from all corners of the earth. The other day I happened to pick up a copy of the Boston Marine News, which contained some startling figures. For instance, it may be news to gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that we are importing thousands of tons of anthracite coal from Europe, that we are importing tens of thousands of barrels of crude oil every week from South America, that we are importing butter from Holland, Denmark, and New Zealand, canned beef from Argentine, manganese ores from Russia, India, and Brazil. And then you wonder why there is unemployment in this country. Thousands of papermakers are out of work because of large importations of pulp and print paper from Canada, Scandinavia, Russia, and the Baltic States.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. We are also importing a considerable quantity of potatoes. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman explain why, when his party was in power, we were unable to get a tariff on man-

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to show up the gentleman's lack of information, but I am afraid I shall have to do so. The Republicans gave manganese a tariff of $20 a ton, which has been reduced under the Cuban treaty to $10 a ton. Does that answer the gentleman? When we went off the gold standard it had the effect of automatically reducing all tariff rates by 41 percent, but that was not enough to suit the free traders. In order to meet the free-trade views of those internationalists down in the State Department, we have since concluded trade agreements with a number of foreign countries which have resulted in a further reduction in the tariff by 50 percent, and then gentlemen wonder why 11,000,000 Americans are walking the streets looking for work.

Why are there 11,000,000 idle Americans? Because of the enormous importation of foreign-produced commodities which are being permitted to come into this country and Zealand, where the cattle are out on green pasture the year displace similar commodities of American origin. We are importing altogether too much from abroad.

According to the report of the Department of Commerce for 1934, I find that during the 12-month period ending December 31 last we imported $1,634,000,000 worth of merchandise of one kind or another. This enormous importation is classified as follows:

Animals and animal products, edible	$48, 971, 999
Animals and animal products, inedible	109, 607, 905
Vegetable food products and beverages	467, 886, 069
Vegetable products, inedible, except fibers and wood	222, 097, 590
Textile fibers and manufactures	240, 213, 847
Wood and paper	181, 454, 490
Nonmetallic minerals	86, 444, 403
Metals and manufactures, except machinery and vehicles	129, 743, 817
Machinery and vehicles	11, 799, 775
Chemicals and related products	65, 125, 717
Miscellaneous	71 487 055

Is there anyone in this Chamber who will contend that when we imported nearly $13,000,000 worth of meat products last year we helped the American cattle raiser? Surely no one will claim that we helped the Minnesota dairyman when we imported $10,864,824 worth of dairy products in 1934. Will it be possible to convince the fishermen on Lake Superior and Lake of the Woods that their well-being was promoted when we imported $23,127,092 of fish. Those who have been employed in our paper mills, but are now out of work, know full well that the reason they are out of work is that we imported $181,454,490 worth of pulp and print paper last year. The thousands of idle stonecutters and miners realize that they are out of work because we imported $86,444,303 worth of minerals last year.

A few moments ago the able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] spoke of the very serious unemployment problem in New England. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that last year we imported textile fibers and manufactures valued at $240,213,847. We imported vegetable food products and beverages to the tune of $467,886,069 during the same period.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to a situation that is giving me the gravest concern: The tariff on butter, as fixed by the Republican tariff law of 1930, is 14 cents per pound, but when we went off the gold standard it had the effect of reducing all tariff rates by 41 percent, which made us the lowest tariff country in the world, save England. As a result of going off the gold standard, the tariff on butter is now only 81/4 cents, which is not anywhere near enough, as is shown by the fact that this year we have already imported nearly two million pounds of butter from New Zealand and Holland. And on March 5 the steamer Port Gisbourne from Wellington, New Zealand, will land a cargo of 31,000 boxes of butter, which will bring the total receipts of butter for January and February and the first 4 days of March up to 4,118,000 pounds.

A colleague recently received a letter from the president of a large dairy company in Michigan, which is engaged in the manufacture of powdered milk. He stated that for years they have sold much of their product to a large buyer on the Atlantic seaboard, and recently this buyer asked him to quote a price on four carloads of powdered milk for delivery in March and April, and he quoted 15 cents per pound delivered. He was advised that the bids submitted by American producers ranged from 14½ to 18½ cents per pound. While the eastern company was considering these bids a cargo of powdered milk came in from Holland upon which was quoted a price of 131/4 cents, which made a difference of about $300 on the two carloads. The Michigan company was obliged to meet this price, although it represented a positive loss on the transaction, but as the president stated in his letter, he had to meet the price in order to fulfill his contract with the farmers who were furnishing the milk, but that he will not be able to do so indefinitely.

Ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, how much longer are we going to stand patiently by while the very ground is being cut from under us by a competition that we cannot meet. Our dairymen cannot meet the prices set by New round, while we must feed our cattle 5 and 6 months in the year, and then we must not lose sight of the fact that all kinds of feed, including hay, have increased in price anywhere from 100 to 300 percent during the last year as a result of the drought. Our paper mills cannot meet the competition of other countries where the wages are comparatively low and the hours long. The same is true of our quarry and mining industries, also of the manufacturing industries.

There can be no return to prosperity until we have put practically all of the ten or eleven million idle Americans back to work. They cannot go back to work so long as we continue this indefensible policy of buying hundreds of millions of dollars worth of products from other countries that we can and should produce here at home. These enormous importations are destroying the morale of our people, and I mean the employers as well as the employees.

If President Roosevelt would announce tomorrow that the dollar is to be stabilized at 59 cents and that the American producer and wage earner are going to be given the American market, the depression would be over in 30 days. That, Mr. Chairman, and the refinancing of agricultural indebtedness at a low rate of interest would result in an era of genuine prosperity in this country such as we have not enjoyed since the golden days before the World War. Let us forget all this internationalism and concentrate upon this one principle that our first duty is to the American people.

I thank you.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Burdick].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to blame anybody this afternoon in what I am going to say, but I want to give you the farmer's version of the situation we are in and how we got there. Then it remains for the Members of this Congress, regardless of party, to try to get us out. That is the only question I desire to present.

The immediate thing that caused the collapse of agriculture was the action of the Federal Reserve Board in the city of Washington on the 18th day of May 1920. That is the day we went broke. It is true that we lived a long time afterward, but the critical stroke had been delivered in May 1920.

During the war, representatives of this Government went to every agricultural section of America and encouraged the farmers to raise more grain, raise more foodstuffs, buy more machinery, more horses, and more land. I can well remember the charts they presented, showing the 12 Federal Reserve banks loaded with money. All that credit was available to the farmers if they would move in and raise foodstuffs, because the Government recognized after war was declared that the greatest power of any nation to defend itself was not in guns or men but in food. We went into debt. We bought more land, more horses, and more machinery. When the war was over and when the country was at peace, I want to present to you gentlemen just what happened.

Out of a clear sky the Federal Reserve Board of this Nation, that controlled the finances of America in a private way, on the 18th day of May sat around the table here in the city of Washington and decided that all of this credit that had been given to the farmers to raise more feed to win the war had to be paid. I say to you that I had a difficult time to find the inside proceedings of that board of directors of the Federal Reserve System, but I finally secured a photostat of those proceedings and I have had it reprinted, and I hold it in my hand now. If you gentlemen are unaware of the danger of leaving the finances of this great Nation, its money and credit, in the hands of private interests, I wish you would read the document of the interworkings of that institution, using their own language.

I can well remember that the people in my section, and I was one of them, were compelled to pay. In a period of 5 months in my own instance, and that was the instance of hundreds of men in the livestock business in the West, I saw my sheep fall from $11.50 a head to 50 cents a head. The bottom fell out of agricultural products, and the bottom fell out of land, merely because this Federal Reserve Board said to us, "You have to pay." When we all had to pay we were all selling, and you can see the economic result of everybody forced into the market to sell their products.

I say to you the way we have left the finances of this Nation for 150 years is not to the credit of this Congress. It seems to me now is the time, if we are going to put this Nation on its feet and make it responsive to the protection of the men and women who compose it, we should take control of the money and credit of this Nation and put it in the hands of the Government and take it away from private interests. [Applause.] Unless we do that we will continue as we are. I know that under the financial system under which we have been living every 50 years the pioneers of America have lost their homes, and the only reason they have not been on the relief rolls before is because we had new territory to which we could move. The history of my own family is indicative of this situation. We came from Rhode Island. When we moved over the Appalachian Mountains into the Ohio Valley and built a new home in the wilderness, it took my forefathers just 50 years to lose that home they had built.

It was just 50 years before it was taken away by foreclosure, through the operation of high interest rates. We did not go on the county, because there was a great domain ahead of us to which we could go, and we went on to the prairies and forests of Wisconsin and we built another home. At the end of the next 50 years we saw these old homesteaders losing their land in Wisconsin-not going on the county, because there was still a new territory to which they could move. Away back in the late seventies and early eighties, having lost our homes in Wisconsin through this financial system, we moved on to the great Territory of Dakota, where we struggled for the next 50 years. Just 3 years ago we held the fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of that great Territory of Dakota, and there on that day I met men and women who had come into the country in covered wagons, driving the Indians and buffaloes out, and settled on the prairie, where they were given 480 acres of the best land on earth. In that county meeting, with at least 200 pioneers present, not more than a mere handful in the entire county could stand up and say they owned their own homes. They had lost their land. Let me tell you that in that great Territory to which we moved 55 years ago we have already lost 62 percent of all titles to homesteads.

Where can we go now? Here we are, homeless again after 50 years of pioneering in the Great Plains country. We cannot go on West as we used to do. The West is gone; there is no more West. All the homesteads have been taken that are of any value. No; we have now reached the end of the trail, and for the first time in the history of this country we cannot escape that financial pressure which has ever and ever pushed us on to the West. The pressure is now stronger than ever, but, helpless to escape it, we are literally standing with out backs to our own doors fighting for our homes. We ask remedial legislation and emergency legislation, such as the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, the soldiers' adjusted-compensation bill, the old-age-pension bill, as a means to refinance our homes which we still occupy and which have been taken away from us; we ask that our circulation be increased by the finance of this bill and the soldiers' bonus bill as a means to increased buying power to help industry; we ask an adequate old-age-pension bill that will protect the old, insure jobs for the young, and leave the distribution of relief in the hands of the aged and the sympathetic instead of the cold-blooded, unsympathetic bureaus.

These remedial measures we must have. But the real question before the American people is greater than either of these—it is a question whether the great mass of the American people shall have a right to live under the protection of the Constitution, or whether the money power of the country shall continue to use the Government's money and credit for their own private profit while the millions suffer. Profit must be replaced by service; wealth must be supplanted by patriotism; confidence in government by the masses must replace special privilege if this Government is to endure.

Why should New England be interested in the situation of the 40,000,000 people engaged in agriculture? New England is distinctly a manufacturing center. Who are her purchasers? In normal times—1914 to 1920—the figures in the Department of Agriculture show that the farmers of America purchased 40 percent of the output of the steel mills, 42 percent of the output of the leather mills, 45 percent of the output of the textile mills. Today the manufacturing plants of New England are not only closed but are being dismantled and sold because there is no businessthis upon the authority of the Honorable Charles L. GIF-FORD. Why is there no business in the New England mills? It is because a great farming empire-North and Southhas lost its buying power. The constant and never-ending program of selling their products below the cost of production, while methods of finance, high-interest rates, and taxes has worked on under the assumption that the farmer can always pay, has destroyed the farming business; and with that went the destruction of their buying power. Yes, old New England must get into this farm fight and put the farmer back in a position where he can take over the output of its mills, if either the farmer or the manufacturing interest of New England is to be saved to our civilization. The interest of both groups is interdependent—what will help the one will help the other.

I say to you that the great problem before the American people today, the real problem, is the same conflict that has been carried on in this country for 150 years. You gentlemen of the South ought to feel proud of the men you have produced who stood on the side of the people in this great contest. I refer to Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, all born in the South. If you read the lives of any one of those four men, you will find that the contest which they were fearful of was the coming contest between the people on one side struggling for the mere right to live and on the other a combination of financial men who would think more of profits than they would of patriotism for their own country.

I say, in this Congress we can take some steps now, through the building of a central bank or Government ownership of the Federal Reserve System, that will give to the Congress that which the Constitution guarantees—the power to issue money and regulate the value thereof. That is our job, as I see it. Many things can be done to bridge us over until that time arrives, but it is a challenge to all parties in this Nation, to all men and women who love the institutions that we represent and who believe in this Government and will defend it, to recover this Government from the control of private interests and put it back into the hands of the American people, where it belongs. [Applause.]

A LAME DUCK'S SOLILOQUY

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House of Representatives who had the privilege of serving with the Honorable Edgar Howard, who represented the Third District of Nebraska, will, I am quite certain, join me in expressing our appreciation of the splendid service he rendered during the 12 years he was associated with us.

He is possessed of gracious and kindly attributes. On more than one occasion he demonstrated by his votes that he had the courage of his convictions, and the siren song of expediency never swerved him from the path of duty. He accepted the verdict of November 6, 1934, in that fine spirit which is indicative of his character.

The following contribution of blank verse entitled "A Lame Duck's Soliloguy" is in my estimation a literary gem, and is just what we might expect from our gentlemanly and scholarly friend. It is my privilege, by permission of the House, to present it to his former colleagues:

A LAME DUCK'S SOLILOGUY

Not by my request nor by my desire, But by cold and adverse circumstance I have been relegated to that realm I have been relegated to that realm
Which all statesmen view with apprehension.
Try as I may to wear a don't-care smile,
Acting as though I wanted to retire,
Methinks my colleagues view me doubtfully,
Beholding sickness in my bravest smiles.
Through the years many swan songs I have heard
Prom the lips of other fallen lame ducks,
But, thanks to the gods and good George Norris,
I shall be spared the speaking of swan words.
Never again will I be one of six
To help the good chaplain raise the curtain
For fun or tragedy on a new day
In that arena wherein Jack Garner
Oft hurled verbal barbs at the Mellonites, Oft hurled verbal barbs at the Mellonites, Sometimes to wound the opulent belies Of Morgan and Mellon, Meyer and Mills— Sometimes to see them broken on the shield Sometimes to see them broken on the shield Of Ohio's always princely Longworth. Those glad days are gone, never to return To this lame duck. But the gods were good In giving me those days. My lame leg hurts, But the spreness is soothed by memory Of that high privilege which I enjoyed In elbow-touching with master mortals Who halled me as worthy their friendship. In that highest legislative body Which ancients or moderns have ever known

-Edgar Howard.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee to what I consider one of the greatest and most destructive economic errors in the history of this or any other civilization. I refer to the mad, insane policy of reclamation as practiced in these United States of America.

Primarily, let me say that in these United States of America there are outside, under the sun, arable acres to the number of 973,000,000. Normally there are in cultivation in continental America approximately 300,000,000 acres. By virtue of the reduction policy of the Agricultural Administration there are now in production approximately 250,000,000 acres, hardly more than one-quarter of the arable lands in these United States; and yet, for a number of years last past, the Federal Government has poured into this policy of reclamation millions of dollars; and, under the drive of departmental propaganda coming from the Department of the Interior, private enterprise has poured into this reclamation folly more than a billion dollars.

The problem of the farmer today, the problem of the farmer yesterday, and for the last 10 years, has been, Mr. Chairman, the problem of surplus. The experience of many of the Members on the floor this afternoon goes back to the days of the Farm Board, by which $500,000,000 was expended in a vain effort to control the surplus in the various crops. Under the present A. A. A. the policy of control of the surplus was adopted through the medium of legislation that permitted acreage retirement and benefit payment. Yet the Department of the Interior, at loggerheads and at war with the policies of the Department of Agriculture, has pursued this fatal policy of bringing new lands into production. Today, within the confines of America some 3,000,000 additional acres are being brought into production; 3,000,000 additional acres which will add to the surplus and add to the existing distress of the farmers.

My friends of the reclamation States say that is only a fancied, a seeming surplus. They claim, if you please, that crops of all kinds created by reclamation amounts to but 1 percent of the crop production in America. This, gentlemen, is, of course, a definite fiction; in some fields the increased croppage rises as high as 15 percent; in certain crop production it has preempted fields that formerly were not surplus crops and has made them surplus. To meet the surplus-crop objection they say that the money that goes into this insane practice and policy is their own money, that it comes from their own States, from public lands. are no more entitled to that money, Mr. Chairman, than is the city of New York entitled to the money collected there from customs. Today, however, they are marching straight | empire builders of the Department of the Interior. The into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman put into his remarks the amount of money we are spending to increase production and also the amount of money we are spending to control production?

Mr. CULKIN. I will add those figures later in my remarks.

Mr. KNUTSON. And show by just what amount we are by this insane method wasting literally hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. CULKIN. In response to the gentleman's observation, I may state that several of the projects that have been put into effect by Mr. Ickes—Honest Harold, the head of the P. W. A.—have been condemned by Congress; no one knows that fact better than the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor], a man for whom I have the greatest respect and whom I regard as an able and sincere reclamationist.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman not know that it has been the fixed policy of Congress during the last few years, up to the Seventy-third Congress, to not authorize or bring into operation any new reclamation projects, because we were troubled with an agricultural surplus; but that the policy has been simply to protect and maintain what we had already invested?

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is correct. That was the policy definitely agreed on. That covenant has been violated.

Mr. MICHENER. Before the new deal.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; until Congress in an evil hour delegated its power to allocate funds to the P. W. A. and its advisers, whoever they are.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Michigan mentioned that that had been the policy up to the Seventythird Congress. I take it he means that that was the policy up to the spring of 1933.

Mr. MICHENER. What I mean is this, and it is generally conceded by those men who have been here any length of time, as has the gentleman from Minnesota; it has been generally conceded and advocated by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor], the chairman of the subcommittee, that we should not bring into cultivation and operation additional projects; that if we only took care of what we had, then we would have too much; but during 1933 and from then on, under Executive order we have continuously developed and made arrangements to develop these new projects.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I will develop this matter more fully a little later.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The gentleman from Michigan is referring to this program of planned economy, is he not?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; planned economy, Mr. Chairman, where one department is definitely at variance with the plans of another.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. At the very time when Secretary of Agriculture Wallace has spent several hundred millions to take 35,000,000 acres out of cultivation, is it not true that Secretary Ickes has authorized over $100,000,000 to finance reclamation projects that will put 4,000,000 acres into a state where it can be cultivated?

Mr. CULKIN. What the gentleman says is true. I will say to the gentleman and to the Committee that for years there has been a definite struggle going on between the economists of the Department of Agriculture and the pseudo empire builders of the Department of the Interior. The A. A. A. is in charge of crop reduction under Mr. Chester Davis, a sincere and able public official. While he is endeavoring to control surplus and bring up the price level for farm produce this Reclamation Bureau is murdering his program. Reclamation should be under the Department of Agriculture. When saner times come it will go there.

The economists of the Department of Agriculture have protested against the introduction of any more land. These empire builders in the Bureau of Reclamation, who had the urge to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, are insisting upon the development of new land. I will go into that a little more specifically in a moment.

Mr. Chairman, on February 23, 1933, I made some remarks in the House which dealt with this question of reclamation. I make bold to say that the facts contained in those remarks have never been successfully disputed. Those remarks were called to the attention of the reclamation forces in America, and, as a result, I had a call from two distinguished gentlemen who were interested in this proposition. One of them was Marshall Dana, editor of the Portland Oregonian, and the other one was John W. Hawes, agricultural economist of the Northern Pacific Railroad. They were most interesting gentlemen, and in due course they opened up the question of how the House, in my opinion, would stand on future reclamation policies and how it stood upon the continuance of the existing works where a reclamation policy or a reclamation project had actually been put to work.

I assured those gentlemen that so far as I knew it was not the purpose of the House to cripple any existing project, where the community had entered upon a specific development, but that I believed the House was soundly and vigorously against the reclamation of new areas. Then and there these two gentlemen, coming ostensibly from Dr. Mead, of whom I shall speak more fully later, agreed in substance that the policy of reclamation should stop where it was and go no further. They specifically stated that they would fight in the interest of their own people who were already on the land against any further reclamation until America's population had increased substantially. They stated they would particularly oppose the Grand Coulee project, which, if put into effect, will bring into bearing some 1,200,000 acres of land. These gentlemen went their way. I forgot to add, Mr. Chairman, that Marshall Dana at that time was not only the able editor of that great newspaper, the Portland Oregonian, but was also president of the Reclamation States Association of America. Of course, he spoke with some authority on the proposition.

The Congress, in an evil hour, turned over to the President and to the departments some $3,000,000,000. When Congress had departed, as the distinguished Chairman of the Committee well knows, the Department of the Interior, through these alleged empire builders, who are destroying the American farmers, proceeded to put vast projects to work.

The P. W. A. made an allotment of $105,390,000 to various reclamation projects last year. This money is not taken out of the revolving funds, so-called, but comes direct from the United States Treasury. Some day the people who toil and who create the wealth of America will have to pay this back. Here is the list:

I want to give the Committee today an illustration of several of these projects, and I shall begin with the Casper-Alcova, Wyo., project.

The Casper-Alcova, Wyo., project was condemned by the investigators and economists of the Department of the Interior. You gentlemen will readily find that upon investigation. There was no need for further reclamation in Wyoming, and yet Honest Harold, under some urge, proceeded to put this proposition to work. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the Casper-Alcova project will cost when completed $300 an acre, with a nominal deduction for power development. It is a fact, not capable of successful contradiction, that better land than the Casper-Alcova land, with water on it, can be bought at present along the North Platte River, in the State of Wyoming, for the sum of $40 an acre. The Casper-Alcova land is a sour, inferior land, as appears from the record.

Mr. GREEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming. Mr. GREEVER. The gentleman made the statement that there was no further need for reclamation in the State of Wyoming. Is the gentleman familiar with that land?

Mr. CULKIN. I am familiar with the situation, and I may say to the gentleman that I have read the report on the Casper-Alcova project very carefully. May I inquire of the gentleman if he has read it?

Mr. GREEVER. The report on the Casper-Alcova project?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEVER. I have read it a great many times.

Mr. CULKIN. Then the gentleman knows what I am talking about. The gentleman found that the Casper-Alcova land was an inferior land?

Mr. GREEVER. I know the present allotment of land for the Casper-Alcova project is approximately 36,000 acres of very fine land. May I ask the gentleman one more question? Does the gentleman know that Natrona County has contributed from oil royalties something like $50,000,000?

Mr. CULKIN. That money belongs to the people of the United States just as much as the customs duties collected at the port of New York belong to the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, replying further to the gentleman, may I say that I have been over the situation with some care. I do not desire to do injury to any locality. I respect their ambitions and their desire for development. In the last session of Congress the distinguished former Member from Wyoming, Mr. Carter, and I discussed this matter at some length. He knew I had an arrow in my quiver for this project, and he protested vigorously that the land would be used only for sugar-beet production, which was a nonsurplus crop. Thus he lulled me into a state of quietude. I admired the gentleman. He was a useful Member of the House, and I am sure the gentleman who succeeded him will be as able and distinguished. Subsequent to that, and by a singular turn in the wheel of fate, the Department of Agriculture, through a bill that came from the Department and passed the House, reduced beet-sugar production in America. This procedure had no effect on the mad reclamationists headed by Dr. Mead. This project went on. What I definitely say in response to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. GREEVER] is that this Casper-Alcova project proposition is unsound from every angle. I may say also that I know the genesis of it. It is rated unsound in the documents of the Department, and the acreage should not have been put in work costing $300 an acre, with a nominal reduction for power, when better land in the same State and having water on it can be bought for $50 an acre.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. May not all this building activity be promoted on account of the fact that a very prominent gentleman in this administration is very active in the building game? I do not know, but I am simply wondering if the gentleman has any information about that.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have been more or less militant with respect to the Postmaster General, if the gentleman meant him, but I am going to give him a clean bill of health on this. I do not believe that reclamation is within the Postmaster General's cosmos. He is active in other fields.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another project in the reclamation hall of fame to which I desire to call the attention of the Committee. I refer to Grand Coulee, that colossal imposition upon the American people, upon every man, woman, and child who toils within the United States, because out of their blood and sweat must eventually come the payment for this folly.

A few minutes ago I called the attention of the Committee to the fact that the distinguished editor of the Portland Oregonian and president of the Reclamation Society of America had told me that he himself would oppose the Grand Coulee at this time. The National Grange opposed the Grand Coulee, Every agricultural influence opposed the Grand Coulee, and Mr. Dana, the president of the Reclamation Society of America, said it should not go on for at least 25 years. Yet when Congress' back was turned Dr. Mead put into work this new, outrageous implement or machinery for creating more surplus. This monster crime against the farmers of America will cost approximately $250,000,000, bringing into production 1,250,000 additional acres.

Of course, the Department of the Interior, or the P. W. A., in its original break-down on this proposition, called it power, but in fact it had no power phases. That was a red herring that was drawn across the trail. There is nobody to sell power to up in that country except the coyotes and the jackrabbits. It is not marketable.

Up in that country and on the same Columbia River, at Bonneville, on the lower Columbia, is a development that will cost before it is finished approximately $50,000,000. I have no quarrel with this. I think it is a sound power and navigation development, and the disbursement a proper one.

However, the original break-down called the Grand Coulee project power, and then a sense of guilt stole over the rather blunt consciousness of Mr. Honest Harold Ickes, and in a second break-down he called it reclamation. He became ashamed and afraid of his fraud on the people of America and called it by its true name, which was and is reclamation.

I am going to call your attention to an interesting fact bearing on the visit of the two gentlemen I have named to my office in the year 1933. Sometime late last year, 1934, the Secretary of the Interior appointed a committee of two members to make a review of the reclamation proposition in America. He appointed F. E. Schmitt, who, I think, is the editor in chief of the Engineering Record, an authoritive magazine. I have no doubt Mr. Schmitt is an able engineer.

He also appointed a gentleman who was one of those who visited me with Mr. Dana, Mr. John W. Haws, an agricultural economist in the employ of the Northern Pacific Railroad. This committee gave a whitewash, if you please, to the projects which Mr. Haws condemned in my office and Mr. Schmitt's magazine had criticized editorially. They gave a whitewash, an unjustifiable whitewash, to this horrible economic crime against America and against the struggling farmer, East and West. They gave a thick coat of whitewash to this proposition and, more particularly, the proposition of the Grand Coulee. This committee was under retainer from the Reclamation Bureau. It was a packed court and packed

The history of this project is interesting. The fate of national leaders has been determined by the Grand Coulee. Heads have fallen into political baskets, and at least one face has ceased to illumine the United States Senate since this project was put in work. An investigation by the gum-shoe division of Secretary Ickes' Department into this project brought peculiar results. As I have said, one man at least disappeared from the political lists last year. It would be too sorrowful to dwell on that. What I wish to emphasize is that in the face of the great quantity of arable land in the United States and in the face of this unparalleled overproduction in every phase of agriculture to which this land in the Grand Coulee or Casper-Alcova is suited, they proceed to put these projects in work.

There is another phase of this matter which I wish to call to your attention. The distinguished President of the United States, after his trip on the Pacific, came overland and made certain speeches en route, more particularly in the Grand Coulee district. If my memory serves me right, the President of the United States told the people there that this development was for the people of the United States, and he urged them to come and settle upon this land. The President was ill-advised on this, for he did not know that the men and women who go on these lands are ruined in advance.

Mr. Chairman, let me tell the Committee that never, in the history of reclamation, has a single project that I know of been financed on its own merits. They either have been financed by private capital, which was wholly or partially lost in these enterprises, or they have been financed in large part by the Government.

There are many of the Federal projects running into millions of dollars which the Government has written off the books. The remaining and existing governmental projects show a period of payments extending as high as 96 years with an annual payment per acre as low as 98 cents. It should be remembered that these are deferred payments not actually beginning until the project had been for many years undergoing conditions.

To give you an illustration of the methods of repayment, I cite you a partial list of these projects with the period of repayment:

Project	State	Period of repay- ment
Boise Belle Fourche. Strawberry. Garland Kittitas. Baker Vale Owyhee	Idaho	Years 46 41 32 40 96 85 67

These are typical of the whole and from these figures it will be seen that the grandchildren of the present workers on these projects will be still paying for this land. No further evidence is needed of their absolute futility. With regard to the payments on private projects, the history of the California irrigation districts, which are perhaps the best from the economic standpoint, show a history of bankruptcy and financial compromise. The following table demonstrates my point:

Name of district	Bonded indebted- ness incurred	Basis of settlement on bonds
Grapelend. East Riverside. Alessandro. Perris. San Jacinto and Pleasant Valley Escondido. Central	$129,000 237,000 765,000 400,000 225,250 350,000 570,000	No settlement, 25 to 50 cents per dollar. Bonds held void. 40 cents per dollar (part, total loss). No settlement. Settled for $200,000. 35 cents per dollar.
Central Browns Valley Sunset Alta Tulare Tipton Tule River Rialto	140,000 329,500 543,000 500,000 100,000 411,000	30 cents per dollar. No settlement. 75 cents per dollar. 50 cents per dollar. 72 cents per dollar. 50 cents per dollar. 12 to 25 cents per dollar.

The widows and orphans whose money was invested in these private reclamation projects could give eloquent testimony of their financial unsoundness.

I want to repeat, if I have already stated the thought, that every man who went onto one of those reclamation projects has suffered; he was first exploited by the locality. then he was up against the proposition that he had little local market, and when he shipped his produce to Denver, Chicago, or New York the market was glutted. So he was ruined and destroyed. The House probably knows that Dr. Mead has been hung in effigy more times than Benedict

I will say to the Committee that Dr. Mead, head of the Reclamation Bureau of the Department of the Interior, is the man behind the gun. He wrecked and was driven out of Australia. He partially wrecked agriculture in California, and is now engaged upon wrecking the whole of agricultural America. I charge him anew, as I did last year, with being public enemy no. 1 of these United States, and more particularly the farmers of this Nation.

Mr. GREEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. GREEVER. The gentleman made the statement that there had never been a reclamation project self-supporting. Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEVER. Does the gentleman mean public or private—one or both?

Mr. CULKIN. I mean both.

Mr. GREEVER. I know many that are self-supporting. Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman will have to be specific. What I mean is that the project did not finance itself.

Mr. GREEVER. There are projects in the State of Wyoming that have done that.

Mr. CULKIN. There was a gentleman named Teele, who wrote a book on the economics of reclamation. Probably the gentleman has seen the book. Mr. Teele was at one time in the Department of Agriculture. While he was there he did not dare to write the book, but after he retired he gave it to the world. It should be read by every Member of Congress. That book is sound in its every conclusion, and I commend the reading of it to the gentleman. May I say further that I have no desire to inflict harm upon any locality which has an existing project, or a project in work? What I am fighting against here is the extension of reclamation. In that connection, again taking issue with the unfortunate suggestion of the distinguished President of the United States, and with all due respect to his high position, charming character, and great achievements, I say to the people of the United States who are meditating going on these lands that certain ruin stares them in the face if they do. Exploitation first and then bankruptcy. That is definitely my conclusion, and that is the conclusion of this dis-tinguished economist, Mr. Teele, who tore the mask off the grotesque face of reclamation.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.
Mr. ZIONCHECK. I have the committee hearings open at page 105, giving the status of the construction costs and the amount of repayment, and, coming down to the line of repayment, here are the percentages of repayments. The gentleman can get the list of the States on the left-hand side. Arizona project, which is the Salt River project, 100percent repayments; Arizona-California project, 97.7-percent repayment; California project, the Orland project, 96.2-percent repayment; and, going down the line without mentioning the States, the next one is 100 percent, the next 73.1 percent, the next 100 percent, the next 99.8 percent.

Mr. CULKIN. I do not want the gentleman to make a speech in my time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. On page 107, the gentleman will get the payments of rentals.

Mr. CULKIN. I hold to my general statement, to the contrary. The bookkeeping in the Reclamation Bureau, if carried on in a bank, would put all concerned in jail.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to put this list that I refer to in the RECORD.

Mr. CULKIN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I object to that. I do not want that poetry inserted in my speech.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Then I shall ask later on to put it in.

Mr. CULKIN. I shall have no objection to that.

In conclusion, I assert that this reclamation policy as carried on by the Federal Government and as encouraged by the Federal Government on private reclamation projects has really been in large measure the reason for the surplus, that it has no justification in agricultural economics, and is, in fact, one of the chief contributing factors to the condition in which the farmers of America find themselves today.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did I understand from the gentleman's remarks that the Casper-Alvoca project is suitable principally to the growing of sugar beets?

Mr. CULKIN. That is what I was advised.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman know that at the present time the farmers in the vicinity of Toledo, Ohio, in that rich agricultural belt, are being denied the privilege of growing 17,000 acres of sugar beets this very year?

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I urge, Mr. Chairman, that the Congress regain its constitutional control of the Federal Treasury and stop this mad folly. I say that in charity to every community which has a project in work. If it is not stopped, this mad reclamationist, Dr. Mead, will destroy agriculture in America as he destroyed it in Australia and other parts of the world. I submit those thoughts for your careful consideration and appropriate action when legislative opportunity offers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. In view of some of the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] I think it appropriate to call attention to the hearings of this committee a year ago on this matter. We went into this matter quite fully at that time, and have done so in nearly all of the hearings for the last 12 or 15 years. Last year, on page 70-71 of the hearings, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] cross-examined Dr. Mead before this subcommittee, of which I have the honor to be chairman. Dr. Mead then said, speaking of all the reclamation projects in the United States:

The whole area under production is less than 1 percent of the cultivated area of the United States. That 1 percent is scattered over one-third of the United States, and in that one-third cities and towns today are growing faster than the farmer. The local demand for the things that are grown on Federal reclamation projects grow faster than the production, and the amount that goes outside constantly diminishes. We send very few things East that can be produced in the East. What we send East are things that cannot be produced in the East, like our winter lettuce or our cantalogue or fruit. Nothing could be more harmful to the that cannot be produced in the East, like our winter lettuce or our cantaloups or fruit. Nothing could be more harmful to the country than to stop the increase in fruit production.

I was in the city of Yakima a week ago. They are shipping apples today to six of the most important countries of Europe in largely increased quantities. The people who are shipping those apples buy corn in Nebraska. They do not compete with the Middle West in growing corn; they grow a product so superior in quality that they have a world market.

The East gets the benefit of making clothes for the western irrigator, making their automobiles, making their plows, and the eastern workman gives the eastern farmer his trade. We do not compete for it. To say, as is frequently stated, that in the East land is rented to take it out of production and thus reduce the surplus, while the Government is appropriating money to help the western irrigators to increase production and hence add to the surplus, shows a total misconception of the situation in the irrigated regions and of the reasons for providing a better water supply for lands now irrigated. Everyone knows that if there was no irrigation in the arid one-third of the country it would not help the eastern farmers, because the market for products of the eastern no irrigation in the arid one-third of the country it would not help the eastern farmers, because the market for products of the eastern factories and stores, which has been created by irrigation, gives employment to people who are fed from the products of the eastern farms. In other words, irrigated agriculture sends very few farm products east; it sends practically all of its orders for manufactured articles to the Eastern States and towns, and the workers who make these goods are fed from the products of the eastern farms. In this way irrigated agriculture supplements and supports the eastern farms rather than competing with them. the eastern farms rather than competing with them.

Now I may say this is no new subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] has discussed this matter at great length nearly every year for many years. The fallacy of his criticism is this: In 1902 Congress enacted the irrigation-reclamation law. The law provided for the creation of a revolving fund to be made by collecting 5 percent from the sales of all public lands throughout the West and certain royalties on oil and coal and some other sources entirely from our western country. We of the West, from our own country, have created and furnished every dollar that has ever gone into that fund ourselves. I refer to the projects heretofore built, and built out of the reclamation fund. Not one dollar of all the money that has ever gone into that fund ever came out of the entire State of New York or any other Eastern or Northern or Southern State. It came out of our country, out of our property, and out of our work.

Out of our own development of that great wilderness of the West, one-third of the area of the United States. When we voluntarily created that fund to populate that country, to furnish homes for the surplus population of all the rest of the United States. Our principal crops do not compete scarcely at all with the farm crops of any other parts of our country. Our range cattle and sheep and our sugar beets and alfalfa do not at all affect the farmers of the rest of the country any more than the cotton and tobacco of the South affects us.

Dr. Mead is correct when he says that only 1 percent of the area of all the agricultural crops of the United States is under irrigation on all the reclamation projects throughout the entire country. It seems to me it is utterly nonsensical and ridiculous to say that that infinitesimal amount can injuriously affect the welfare of the farmers of the United States.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it not true that today in Washington in every chain store you will find Idaho potatoes, irrigated potatoes? Is it not true that on every fruit stand and in every market you will find Yakima or Washington irrigated apples? You will find them right in our cloakroom, in competition with the Maryland apple and the Michigan and Maine potatoes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Would the gentleman insist on inferior potatoes being sold here when better potatoes come from Idaho and from the West?

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, the gentleman is an optimist.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. But I object to the gentleman saying that irrigation does not compete with the farmer of the East. The gentleman read some testimony that they only sent lettuce and cantaloups and a few things like that back East. I am calling attention to the fact that they ship potatoes and lettuce and fruit, which the gentleman will find on his own table tonight.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the eastern advertisements about Idaho potatoes are a good deal like the advertisements are about Rocky Ford cantaloups. There is not the slightest doubt that the Rocky Ford cantaloup is the finest cantaloup ever grown on this planet. Those wonderful cantaloups are raised only in Colorado. The truth is that when they get ripe they are cut in two, the seeds taken out, and luscious cantaloups is thrown out to waste. Thousands of acres of the finest cantaloups on earth go to rot every year. The owners dry the seed and ship and sell that seed at a high price all over the world. The people who buy that seed plant it and raise the cantaloups, and then the eastern stores advertise them everywhere as the famous Rocky Ford cantaloup. They make a pretty good imitation for the first year.

After that they are practically of no account, but they are sold universally throughout the country as "Rockyford cantaloups." Not one out of a thousand ever came from Colorado, and I think some people may be capitalizing the Idaho potatoes the same way. But even if a few western potatoes are sold in the East it is such an insignificant item that it is hardly worth mentioning. It looks like straining at a gnat. Another thing, some of the Members of the House talk as though all the agricultural crops we raise in the West are on governmental irrigation projects. As a matter of fact, not 5 percent of our crops are grown on Federal reclamation projects. A very large percentage of all our crops are raised by irrigation, but it is by privately built and owned and operated canals, ditches, and reservoirs.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman for his leniency in dealing with me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Frankly, I expect, when we reach the consideration in this bill tomorrow of the items for the Bureau of Reclamation, to yield time to some of my western colleagues to further comment on this subject.

Mr. CULKIN. I was going to ask the gentleman if it is not true that fruit and other products grown on arable land that God put under the sun for that purpose, are more prolific in this quality known as "vitamins" than that grown under irrigation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I doubt that very much, but I cannot testify as an expert on vitamins. I think we have the finest fruit in the world.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] is very courteous and we all appreciate that the West owes much to the gentleman so far as its reclamation projects are concerned. It is the gentleman's fairness that has always helped him get these projects; but is it not true that the gentleman, appreciating the situation in the country, 4 or 5 years ago, assumed an attitude, as did most western reclamationists who were in the House at that time, that they would do well if they maintained the projects which they had, and that they came before the various committees asking for assistance for those projects to keep them going and keep them alive, with the direct understanding with the rest of us that there would be no new projects asked for, so long as we had an agricultural surplus?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

I ask the gentleman from Michigan if it is not true that us western Members have absolutely kept the faith from that day to this? I do not recall that Congress has enacted a single bill creating any new reclamation project for several years.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; and as was suggested by the gentleman from New York, the Congress established that policy, a policy agreed to by all interested here; but when the Congress was sent home the last session, the powers that were spending the people's money—money which did not come from the West—went out there and started these various projects in direct opposition to the policy the gentleman from Colorado and others had agreed to. At that time Congress was gone, and no one could object; and we are now confronted with those very projects which will do the very thing suggested by the gentleman from New York.

As stated by the gentleman from Colorado, we are keeping the faith, we are keeping our agreements; but we did not dream at that time that in the near future we would be confronted by another policy which would vitiate and destroy the very agreements we adopted, and which some of us voted for at our own peril because we did not come from reclamation States. We have kept those agreements, but we object to another authority coming along and vitiating the thing with regard to which we have entered into a gentlemen's agreement.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from New York, and the House, to page 105 of the testimony taken within the last week by this subcommittee on this bill. That gives a complete construction account of all repayments up to June 30, 1934, on all the 24 existing projects. It shows that 10 of them are paid up 100 percent and 8 are paid up over 99 percent. Two of them are down—one 73.1 percent and the other 74.8 percent. Both of those have good reasons for not paying. But the average percentage of repaid amounts due for all the 24 projects is 98.6 percent. That is a conclusive and wonderfully good showing.

Mr. CULKIN. According to whose books—Mr. Mead's?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am quoting from the records of the Reclamation Bureau.

Mr. CULKIN. In my estimation, the gentleman from Colorado is a sincere and able legislator; and I would be content to let the reclamation policy of this Government be decided and controlled by him. That is how much confidence I have in him. [Applause.] I do not have the same measure of confidence in Dr. Mead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say that the project that is reported as only having paid 73.1 percent of the amount due is the Uncompander project in my district. The reason for that is that about 3 years ago we passed a bill which gave the water users under that project a 5-year moratorium on the construction charges with the understanding that they should expend a certain amount of money each year on drainage work. For that reason they have not been required to pay construction charges for several years.

Mr. CULKIN. And I supported the gentleman in that, did I not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I know the gentleman did, and I very much appreciated his support.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I actively supported it; I recall it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the record of payments on these projects is exceptionally good. The Government is not losing its investment. The reclamation fund is not revolving 100 percent, but it is coming much nearer to it than most enterprises are these days. My committee is assisting in maintaining and completing the projects that we have and making the reclamation fund go as far and do as much good as possible. We do not control the creation of projects by Executive order or their being financed by Public Works money.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman had no voice in them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; not a bit.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman from Colorado is not responsible for them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK].

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time for the purpose of extending my remarks in the Record at this point. I would point out to the gentleman from New York and to the gentleman from Michigan that had it not been for the reclamation projects of the West the relief rolls in Michigan and in New York, and the East generally, would have been larger and a greater burden would have been imposed upon them.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record at this point various schedules of payments not only for construction costs but for operation and maintenance costs, together with an article here as to the condition and the manner in which settlers come upon these reclaimed lands and the services rendered by the Reclamation Service to them after they get upon the land.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman referred to an article. Does the gentleman want to insert some statistics; is that all?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman contend that an official of the Government would deliberately make a false statement before a committee when it could be proven to be

Mr. CULKIN. If he were an insane reclamationist he would testify as an insane man would.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The General Accounting Office certainly would have to pass on these figures.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will tell me what he wants to insert I can tell whether I have objection to it. I have no objection to any official statement.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. These accounts must go through the General Accounting Office.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman referred to an article. What article does the gentleman wish to insert?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is not an article; it is part of the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Is the Okanogan project in the gentleman's State?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is.

Mr. MILLARD. I see they have paid only 77 percent of what they owe the Government.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the people generally throughout the country were able to pay 77 percent of their debts, this country would be far better off. The gentleman does not mention the other Washington project in Yakima which has paid 99.8 of the payments due.

Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in inserting the following data and information from the hearings is to correct the erroneous impression of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN]. The other phases of the general question of reclamation will be ably presented by the learned Chairman of this Subcommittee on Appropriations and some of my western colleagues.

CONDITIONS UPON WHICH ENTRIES ARE MADE BY SETTLERS ON RECLA-MATION PROJECTS

Mr. Zioncheck. To carry on with that question, just how does a new settler get in upon Government land, upon a reclamation project, because what I am leading up to is this rehabilitation program of the President and how it will coordinate. There is a possibility of using this to take the people from the towns that want to do something.

Dr. Mean. Originally the idea was that any man could get on a piece of land, whether or not he had any money or experience. Originally there was no attempt to control values, so speculation People who had neither capital nor experience came in and filed on the public land, and sometimes land was sold for more than it was worth. People that got caught in those situations either lost everything or they have had a struggle that they should not have had. In the readjustment act that was passed in 1926 provision was made that there has to be an examining board for every settler that comes in, and that is a board of practical farmers, and they ask him about his capital and about his experience, and about what his plans are.

about what his plans are.

Mr. Zioncheck. Who appoints that board?

Dr. Mead. We do. The Secretary appoints them.

Mr. Zioncheck. And they are right at the locality of the project?

Dr. Mead. Yes. They are always there at the project, and they know the conditions. There is nothing more helpful to an intending settler. If he is going to bring money into it, he gets an idea from talking with them as to what he is up against, and if he has not capital enough he is excluded at that point. We believe that a farmer needs $2,000, but a farm worker, who just has 4 or 5 acres, can start without capital, because he depends mainly on wages, and the idea is that he gets cheap living.

The law provides that we can appraise that land, fix the price at which it is to be sold.

Mr. White. You are referring at this point to privately owned

Mr. White. You are referring at this point to privately owned land within the district, or are you referring to the Government

CONDITIONS UPON WHICH GOVERNMENT LAND IS SECURED

Dr. MEAD. I am referring to privately owned land. The condi-

Dr. Mead. I am referring to privately owned land. The conditions under which Government land is secured are fixed by the Government. Fillings are usually under the Homestead Act.

Mr. Zioncheck. In both cases you are referring to privately owned land within the boundaries of the district?

Dr. Mead. Yes. To explain further how these land appraisals operate and the change from the settlement methods which originally prevailed. Originally there was no attempt made to control the price at which privately owned land was sold or the speculative increases in the price of privately owned land hefore development. increases in the price of privately owned land before development took place, but now when a new project is under consideration if it includes privately owned land, the owners of that land are required to sign an agreement that they will accept the appraised price, or in some cases if more than the appraised price is secured, one-half of the increase over the appraised price goes to the Government as a payment on the construction charge. To further show how this operates, in one of the districts where the works are under construction or where all the land for which water can be supplied has been settled, the price which the private owners expected to charge was $50 an acre. Their land was sagebrush without any improvewas $50 an acre. Their land was sagebrush without any improvements. Everything needed to convert it into an irrigated farm and enable the settler to make a living had to be done. It had to be cleared, the land leveled, and the buildings put on it. If to these costs there had been added $50 an acre, the settler would have paid more than the land was worth and he would have have paid more than the land was worth and he would have assumed a burden that he could not carry.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. They probably bought it at 50 cents an acre?

Dr. MEAD. Part of it was obtained through buying road grants. I do not know how the remainder was obtained, but these owners were nonresidents, and if there had been no control over the price they could have asked, we would have had to reject the project, because the cost of land and water combined would have been too great. Under the law as it is now a board of appraisers was created familiar with conditions and with the value of irriwas created, familiar with conditions and with the value of irrigated and unirrigated land. The valuation, I think, was liberal, but it was only about $11 an acre.

but it was only about $11 an acre.

Mr. White. Average?

Dr. Mead. Yes. The result of this appraisal and the acceptance of the appraised price by the owners in effect gave the settler his farm for about $40 an acre less than it would have cost him if there had been no control over prices, and this $40 an acre could go into improvements. It made the land attractive, and the project is being settled promptly. Another example is where the land in the district was partly developed. It was leveled and had improvements but an inadequate water supply, and another part of the land was cut-over timberland, rough, where the cost of clearing and leveling ran from $50 to $100 an acre. But this was cut up into small tracts and the work could be done by settlers when not otherwise employed. not otherwise employed.

Here was a severe test of the new plan of fixing prices in advance. Some of the cut-over timberland was valued as low as $2.50 an acre. Its owners protested that they had paid more than that sum in taxes, but the valuation stood and settlers are acquiring this land at that price. Some of the best lands of the project unimproved was valued at from $10 to $15 an acre, and it is so productive that it has been developed and settled as rapidly as the water could be furnished. This is a great advantage to the settler and has hastened the settlement and improvement of farms. In this last instance I am dealing with one of the projects where the cost of construction of canals is the highest yet approved by the Government. It is $170 an acre, and there were once where the cost of construction of canals is the nighest yet approved by the Government. It is $170 an acre, and there were once skeptics who did not believe the Government would ever be repaid. But at a meeting in the valley where this was discussed it was shown that the yearly payments of farmers where land values were kept down is less than the yearly payments of farmers in another district established before speculation was curbed. The construction cost in this older district is only $50 an acre, but the yearly payments on land and water are more than they are in the other project where the construction cost is $170 an acre.

Mr. ZIONCHECK, What do you mean by board of appeals? Is

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What do you mean by board of appeals? Is there such a board here?
Dr. Mead. Yes.

Mr. Zioncheck. I noticed in one of your reports that certain entries were made by settlers and that all of them were approved except three, and that these were upon appeal.

Dr. Mead. Yes.
Mr. Zioncheck. What do you mean by appeal?
Dr. Mead. Until recently when land was thrown open to settlement there was no inquiry into the capital, the experience, the character, or anything which would determine whether the settler was qualified to succeed, but under the Adjustment Act of 1926 provision was made for the establishment of a local board which would interview the prospective settlers and advise them as to the conditions which would confront them and advise the Government as to whether they were qualified to succeed. Experience had shown that on farms of say 40 acres or more a settler would need about $2,000 in money or equipment to make it a safe risk. On smaller areas, say 5 acres, where the settler would depend mainly on wages, and which were in effect farm laborers' allotments, he could be taken on without any capital.

Today the applicants for farms go before these boards and talk are regarded as good prospects are recommended and are approved. Those that are not regarded as good prospects are advised that they will not be approved. Sometimes those rejected appeal. There are other cases where there are two or more applicants for the same farm. Only one application can be approved and the one who loses out sometimes appeals.

Today the applicants for farms go before these boards and talk over conditions and expenses and probable income, and those who are regarded as good prospects are recommended and are approved.

I think the case to which Mr. Zioncheck refers was a case in his own State on the Kittitas project where there were 80 applicants for 20 farms, and where some of those who were not approved have appealed, claiming that they have better qualifications that the ones who were approved.

Mr. Zioncheck. Who constitutes the board of appeals?

Dr. Mead. Usually the same board which interviews settlers at first, or it may be a new board if there is complaint of unfairness. In any case it is a local board usually made up of farmers who are familiar with the local conditions and with the cost of changing raw land into a farm, and with the returns which the settlers may expect.

EXPENSES OF DIVISION OF PUBLIC RELATIONS

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Now, Mr. Kubach, turn to page 257 of the bill, in the seventh line, where you have new language. You have deleted the language "reclamation economics", and put in its place the words "public relations." Why do you have that new language, and what is the intention?

Dr. Mead. That is largely for the dissemination of information to irrigation projects, dissemination of information to the public.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Dr. Mead, will this public-relations office be something like a public-relations office of a private power company to disseminate propaganda rather than enlightenment, or will this be an enlightening organization?

Dr. Mead. It is an educational organization, for the people on

Dr. Mead. It is an educational organization, for the people on the projects. We want to give them more instruction than we have been able to give in the past. We want to send experienced, skilled men to all of these projects, to show them how to farm better.

Mr. Wigglesworth. How is that done?

Dr. Mead. I get good men and send them into the field, to talk to individuals and groups of farmers about their work.

Mr. Zioncheck. That is for men who really go out to the settlers and help them to solve the problems as they come up?

Dr. Mead. Yes. It is a question which is the better term, but economics are largely investigation, and we do not do so much of that. It is more to give instructions to these people.

GIVING INFORMATION TO SETTLERS

Mr. Zioncheck. Doctor, on page 271 you have a paragraph reading as follows:

"Giving information to settlers: For the purpose of giving in-"Giving information to settlers: For the purpose of giving information and advice to settlers on reclamation projects in the selection of lands, equipment, and livestock, the preparation of land for irrigation, the selection of crops, methods of irrigation and agricultural practice, and general farm management, the cost of which shall be charged to the general reclamation fund and shall not be charged as a part of the construction or operation and maintenance cost payable by the water users under the projects; $20,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year (1934 is continued available for the same purpose for the fiscal year) 1935."

Does this relate to that other item that we just referred to?

Dr. Mead. Yes; it is now all under public relations.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. You change the language in the previous sec-

Mr. Zioncheck. You change the language in the previous section, and this coordinates with that?

Mr. Zioncheck. You have included new language there, the words "together with" right after $20,000, and that is a new words "together with" right after $20,000, and that is a new appropriation of $20,000.

Would you explain the increased appropriation, or, rather, the reason for that appropriation of $20,000 there?

Dr. Mead. We have more projects, and we wanted to do more work. For the purpose set forth, $20,000, together with the unexpended balance of 1935, is requested. On projects where settlement and agricultural development is going on, there is need for the employment by the Bureau of Reclamation of men of sound business training and knowledge of irrigation practice to advise beginners regarding their development and farming operation, together with advising them as to crop rotation and marketing conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Greever].

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, there have been some things said here relative to reclamation by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] which I should like to answer.

In the first place, I have lived within a country containing reclamation projects for the past 15 years. This project is located in the State of Wyoming, in Park County. It contains several thousand acres, and the principal crops of this project are alfalfa, sugar beets, potatoes, and beans. I have observed while living in this locality that some of these crops are shipped out to eastern markets, principal among them being potatoes. I know that a large proportion of the forage crops are fed and disposed of to what may be termed "local" markets. Many cattle and sheep are fed from these forage crops.

The crops are largely noncompetitive with other crops, and may I say in this connection that it is my belief that the gentleman's objection to reclamation, based upon an overproduction in this country, is based upon the fact that there is an overproduction which occurs upon nonproductive land, which production is not profitable to the grower and is economically unsound, but I do not believe that any production which is profitable owing to the excellent character of the soil is an unprofitable venture.

I have noticed in this particular locality and in those of which I have spoken that while there may be a small portion of the crops that are produced shipped out, yet I have seen many, many times carloads of farm machinery, furniture, automobiles, foodstuffs, and articles of almost every kind and nature shipped into this project, where only a few years ago there was no community and which was sagebrush country. I also know that there have been shipments of corn from the Midwest to these reclamation projects for use in connection with the farming activities, thereby providing a market for other agricultural projects instead of depriving them of such markets

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEVER. I yield to the gentleman from New York. Mr. CULKIN. I would like to have the gentleman put the name of the project to which he refers in the RECORD.

Mr. GREEVER. I am speaking of the Shoshone project in Park County.

Today that project has hundreds of fine homes, and there is no finer place in the United States in which to live. There is no place in the United States where there are better schools and better surroundings with which to equip young people to start out in life.

As the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] has so ably pointed out, there is less than 1 percent of the crops from the reclamation projects of the United States which are competitive with eastern crops and, therefore, could not contribute to the production any more than that amount.

There is much being said today about the making of homes for people where they can be self-sustaining, and I say to you that it has been my observation that there is no more self-sustaining economic unit in the entire United States, no place where the physical, moral, and mental advantages are greater than upon the reclamation projects in the West.

In a speech recently delivered by Senator Pope, of Idaho, at the national reclamation conference at Salt Lake City, Senator Pope showed that of the $48,000,000 that had become due by the water users of this country, 99.3 percent had been paid.

The most complete refutation of any purportedly expert financial criticism of irrigation, however, is furnished by a review of the liquidation of moneys advanced by the Bureau of Reclamation for initial irrigation development. At this writing, $48,000,000 has become due the reclamation fund from water users. Of that amount only $350,000 has not been paid. In other words, the account of farmers with the Bureau of Reclamation is at present 99.3 percent paid. Moreover, the Bureau of Reclamation is holding for certain irrigation districts $1,200,000 in actual cash which is not due but is being held as cash credit. I very seriously doubt that any other line of business endeavor could, after a comprehensive survey, boast a similar record of solvency in its capital investments.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. Do not forget that that was our money for western land. That did not come out of taxes.

Mr. GREEVER. That is true.

The gentleman from New York has also referred to the Casper-Alcova project and has stated that it should have never been built. As a matter of fact, Natrona County has paid into the reclamation fund of the United States in excess of $50,000,000, through oil royalties from governmental leases, and has not received one cent back to replace this lost asset. There will be reclaimed under this project between forty and sixty thousand acres of land which has been classified by the engineers of the United States, some of the most competent engineers in the world, as being very productive land. It offers an opportunity to the people of that section of the country to feed their cattle and sheep from products of this area. The crops that will be raised upon this project will be noncompetitive crops.

In seasons of drought there has been no influence so prominent in equalizing economic conditions caused by the drought as has reclamation. It has been necessary on many occasions to feed the crops raised upon reclamation projects to cattle and sheep and other livestock in order to permit them to survive through the winter. It provides the crops which are so necessary for the maintenance of the sheep and cattle business.

Power plants that have been constructed in connection with irrigation projects have enabled the citizens of communities to have power and light at a rate which they can afford to pay, and this has gone and will go a long way further in the modernization of the home, about which we hear so much today and which is a constructive and far-sighted policy.

Towns and villages have grown up on the reclamation projects which have contributed much to the buying power of the country. Reclamation is feasible and practical. It has been recognized from time immemorial as a necessary factor in the life of any nation, and the application of water to land in the West is, in my opinion, one of the most progressive developments which we have in the United States today. The Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, and the Director of Reclamation, Dr. Mead, have rendered a service to the American Nation through their recognition of these facts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. White].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from New York, which seems to give the viewpoint of some of the Members from the East on the question of reclamation. I am wondering how well they are acquainted with the various reclamation districts of the West and with their effect upon the business of manufacturing articles which are finding a market in the Western States.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen the irrigation districts built up from barren sagebrush plains into beautiful, flourishing communities. If there has been money expended by the Government it will be repaid, and we must always remember that additions to territory in this country have been made at some expense. Thomas Jefferson bought Louisiana, and for that vast territory he paid money. We bought Alaska. When we added that great domain we paid money. At the time it was thought to be a foolish investment, but it proved that we received a wonderful territory, practically an empire in itself, which enriched this country and the people manyfold.

During the depression, when there was unemployment and distress all over the country, I had the experience of traveling through the irrigated regions of the West and came in contact with the people of those irrigation areas. I found that of all the communities, whether it be in the State of New York or in the Central West, the people in the irrigated communities had withstood the depression and were in a better financial state than were the inhabitants of any of the other communities I visited. The reason was because those people were producers. They are producing new wealth, and they are producing what they consume. A great deal of the products of those districts are consumed at home, or within the State.

I want to call attention to a further fact. A great deal of the products of those districts find outlets in export. For instance, we export our apples; we export other products from those districts and bring new money into the country.

Mr. Chairman, we have in this country 12,000,000 unemployed people. We do not know what to do with them. We are looking for a place where we may give them a home, where we may allow them to establish new communities. What better or finer place can you find than land that is assured of moisture, assured of crops, and is stable, as are these western irrigated communities?

The philosophy expressed here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] is that we have a surplus of products, a surplus of people, and a surplus of land. All he needs is a big knife to cut off the surplus products and cut off the surplus people and surplus land and put them in the discard.

Let us put the land, the products, and the people together and build up new communities in our country.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The A. A. A. in the Department of Agriculture is giving ample precedent for the procedure the gentleman suggests by killing all the little pigs. Is not that

Mr. WHITE. We are reducing production, but to my mind that is a question of finance. Let us straighten out the tangled financial condition in this country and let business grow and develop in the United States. The principles that have been announced here by the gentleman from New York, if they could have been put into operation in the early days, what would have happened to the great State of Illinois, the great Dakotas, and the Central West if we had restricted the development of that country as the gentleman now wants to restrict the development of these great productive areas in

Mr. CULKIN. Let me say to the gentleman, if I may, that in my State, when the farmer's land needs reclaiming or irrigating, he does it himself. This is the doctrine that applies in New York State.

Mr. WHITE. That is what we are doing in the West. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I introduced in the House H. R. 6200, which is a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report on traffic conditions with recommendations for corrective legislation. I earnestly ask the members of the committee to help me secure the passage of this bill. It will not involve any additional appropriation. There is enough money in the contingent fund of the Bureau of Public Roads to make the survey. They must complete the survey in 3

During the late World War we all were shocked and saddened by the daily publication of the casualty lists showing the deaths and injuries which resulted from the great

Today, almost 17 years after the close of hostilities, we read of much greater losses of life and just as extensive injuries, without the emotion and without a second thought as to the cause and prevention of these casualties.

I refer to the daily list of killed and injured on our streets and highways. In the year just passed approximately 36,000 persons lost their lives in traffic accidents-3,000 every month in the year, almost 100 every day. The number is so staggering that it is almost beyond comprehension. It demands immediate thought and consideration and immediate action.

From the year 1913, when figures were first available, the showing a gain over the previous, with the exception of one, 1932.

The tremendous use of motor cars, the increased speeds, and better road conditions, have all been factors in this mounting death rate. At the end of 1933—the latest figures available-there were 23,827,290 motor vehicles registered in the various States. In the past year this figure has been materially increased.

We have spent huge sums of public money to make travel over our highways more comfortable. We have cooperated, through the Federal Bureau of Public Roads, with every State in the Union toward making road conditions better. Our roads are the finest in the world. They are the models for all other nations. They were built for speed and they are used for speed. The average passenger car in good running order travels at the rate of 50 miles an hour upon the open highway with reasonable safety.

Many of our States have uniform, up-to-date, and reasonable traffic laws and regulations. Others have not. Twenty-two States, up to 1930, had no drivers' license law. A few have since adopted regulatory measures. Think of it! Anyone, regardless of age, mentality, physical or other ability, could drive a car in these commonwealths without examination. Is it to be wondered at that a comparison of the records of States with drivers' license laws requiring an examination of all new drivers, and administered by a strong central authority, with those States not having such laws, shows a distinct contrast in motor-vehicle death trends?

A study made by the National Safety Council shows striking evidence of the effectiveness of proper regulation in the records of States before and after the adoption of drivers' license laws.

Aside from the importance of having examined and licensed drivers is the necessity of uniformity of State traffic laws. I am sure that many of you, in driving to your homes, have experienced the necessity of altering your driving in passing from one State to another. In one State you may be permitted to drive at any speed, so long as it is reasonable and with due regard to the safety of others. Passing over the State line, you are greeted with signs warning you that the speed limit is 35 or perhaps 30 miles an hour. Every time you go beyond this limit you are breaking the law. Or perhaps you may go through some city, whose local regulations are unknown to you. Accustomed as you may be to waiting for lights to turn green before turning the corner, you are confused and bewildered by a local ordinance which permits turns on red.

These are just a few of the confusing and troublesome differences in regulations which the average motorist encounters in touring. Is there any wonder there were over 1,000,000 persons injured last year in traffic accidents? Glance at the figures below and note the horrible record of the last year:

Year	Deaths	Per 100,000 popula- tion	Per 100,000 cars
1913	4, 227	4.4	306. 7
1918	10, 723	10. 4	167. 9
1923	18, 394	16. 5	120.5
1924	19, 379	17. 1	109. 2
1925	21, 877	19. 0	109.0
1926	23, 431	20.1	105. 9
1927	25, 796	21.8	110.9
1928	27, 996	23. 3	113. 8
1929	31, 215	25. 7	117.3
1930	32, 929	26.7	123, 5
1931	33, 675	27. 1	129.8
1932	29, 451	23.6	121.6
1000	31, 363	25. 0	132.0
1933 1934 (estimated)	35, 500	28.1	143. 0

Hardly one of us but has had some friend or relative the victim of this confusion and bedlam of regulation or lack of regulation. What are we going to do about it? The toll of pain and misery is increasing even as we deliberate. What can be done to stop it? We cannot go to each of the toll of deaths and injuries has steadily mounted, each year | States and say you must adopt this or that code of laws.

Nor do we want to do that. Cooperation and suggestion will produce the desired results. Coercion will not.

I have given this matter much serious thought, and with the idea of unifying and consolidating the best ideas on the subject I have introduced in Congress a bill. This measure directs the Secretary of Agriculture to use such part as may be necessary of the contingent fund of the Bureau of Public Roads for study and research of traffic conditions and measures for their improvement. He is authorized to cooperate with the State, District of Columbia, and municipal authorities, together with private organizations, educational institutions, and other agencies in his study.

The bill further directs the Secretary of Agriculture to submit a report to Congress as to the status of uniform legislation throughout the country, with recommendations as to any measures which will promote the necessary uniformity in such laws.

This measure does not need an appropriation from Congress. The contingent fund which I have mentioned in my bill is more than ample for the purpose. It is a fund accumulated by the Bureau from the 11/2 percent taken from Federal highway appropriations.

Highway and safety officials have assured me that this legislation is a step in the right direction for sane, reasonable, and uniform traffic laws.

Entirely apart from the physical suffering caused by traffic accidents is the tremendous loss in personal property. It is so huge that no true figure can be obtained. It is safe to say that millions of dollars worth of property are destroyed each year in accidents which are avoidable in many

I am well aware that there are many angles to this question. However, the matter has been under study for a long period of years by various private and Government agencies. The bill which I have introduced will consolidate the opinions and ideas of the best authorities in the country on this subject. There is a divergence of opinion between these experts as to the best form of remedial action. Now is the time to weigh carefully each of their suggestions. Start this study and stop this slaughter. It is vital to you and vours.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

CIRCULATING MEDIUM

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have some interesting information in regard to the circulating media that I would like to insert in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert such information as I desire that will be explanatory of the statements I make.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, the circulating medium consists of demand deposits subject to check and the actual currency and coin that is outstanding. The actual currency and coin has not increased or decreased substantially in 15 years in this country. It remains practically the same. Demand deposits have increased and decreased. It is a wellknown fact that as money becomes dear everything else measured in money becomes cheap.

From 1926 until 1929 demand deposits subject to check aggregated $21,000,000,000. As I have said, the actual money outstanding was about $5,000,000,000. Since that time the banks have called loans and caused deposits to be canceled, until they really have $14,000,000,000 demand deposits in all the banks of this Nation at this time. Therefore the 15,000 banks have canceled, have destroyed, $7,000,000,000 of our circulating medium; yet many of us are accused of being radicals because we merely want to restore $2,000,000,000 of the circulating medium, of which the banks have destroyed $7,000,000,000.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said as the circulating medium increased the prices decreased?

Mr. PATMAN. What I meant was that when the price of money is dear, the price of everything else becomes less valuable.

Mr. FIESINGER. But an increase of money would not make money dear, would it?

Mr. PATMAN. No. An increase of money would make money cheaper and interest rates cheaper, as I understand it.

For instance, from 1926 to 1929 we had on an average $200 per capita circulation of money and credit. To say that so many dollars per capita is in circulation does not mean a thing in the world. The only way to determine the circulating medium is by adding the demand deposits to the money outstanding. An average of $200 per capita during this period of time. In 1934 the per capita circulation was only $150, including both money and credit. We have had onefourth of our circulating medium absolutely destroyed.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. How much of real currency is there at present in circulation?

Mr. PATMAN. About five and one-half billion dollars are presumed to be in circulation. This includes about $700,-000,000 that is normally in the vaults of banks other than Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. SNELL. But is there not more than there was in the period from 1921 to 1927?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; some more.

Mr. SNELL. I saw a statement a short time ago that there was more real money outstanding at the present time than there was in the year 1929.

Mr. PATMAN. There is not much difference, as I said, because it varies very little. Of course, in 1933, when there was a rush on the banks, the circulating medium outstanding, the actual money, increased about $2,000,000,000 right away, because the people were afraid and they wanted to convert their deposits into money. All of this money has not been returned to the banks. For that reason there is more money outstanding now.

I shall be glad to insert in the RECORD the amount outstanding for 1914 to 1934, and other related information.

I want to call attention to what Benjamin Franklin said in his Autobiography, as it is very timely today:

About this time [about the year 1729] there was a cry among the people for more paper money, only fifteen thousand pounds being extant in the province, and that soon to be sunk. The wealthy inhabitants oppos'd any addition, being against all paper currency, from an apprehension that it would depreciate, as it had done in New England, to the prejudice of all creditors. We had discuss'd this point in our Junto where I was on the side of an addition, being presumed that the first small sum struck in 1729 and done being persuaded that the first small sum struck in 1723 had done much good by increasing the trade, employment, and number of inhabitants in the province, since I now saw all the old houses inhabited, and many new ones building; whereas I remembered well, that when I first walk'd about the streets of Philadelphia, eatwent, that when I has wark a good the streets of Finaletpina, eating my roll, I saw most of the houses in Walnut-street, between Second and Front streets, with bills on their doors, "To be let"; and many likewise in Chestnut-street and other streets, which made me then think the inhabitants of the city were deserting it one after another.

Our debates possess'd me so fully of the subject, that I wrote and printed an anonymous pamphlet on it, entitled The Nature and Necessity of a Paper Currency. It was well receiv'd by the common people in general; but the rich men dislik'd it, for it increas'd and strengthen'd the clamor for more money, and they happening to have no writers among them that were able to answer it, their opposition slacken'd, and the point was carried by a majority in the House. My friends there who conceiv'd I had been of some service, thought fit to reward me by employing me in printing the money; a very profitable job, and a great help to me. This was another advantage gain'd by my being able to write.

The utility of this currency became by time and experience so advantage gain'd by my being able to write.

The utility of this currency became by time and experience so evident as never afterwards to be much disputed; so that it grew soon to fifty-five thousand pounds, and in 1739 to eighty thousand pounds, since which it arose during the war to upwards of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds, trade, building, and inhabitants all the while increasing, tho' I now think there are limits beyond which the quantity may be hurtful.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I remember the quotation correctly, Franklin was differentiating between a redeemable and an irredeemable paper currency.

Mr. PATMAN. The point is, I may say to the gentleman from Michigan, that the houses in Philadelphia were vacant; "for rent" signs were on the houses on practically every street; but by increasing the circulating medium it caused good times, and people soon filled those homes. In addition to that, trade increased. That is the point I was making.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My point was that Franklin distinguished between the paper money for which there was a a redeemable paper money as against an irredeemable paper money.

Mr. PATMAN. I am not taking issue with the gentleman. I surmise his conclusions are correct, because Franklin states here:

I know there are limits beyond which the quantity may be hurtful.

I agree that there are, of course. In Germany the people deliberately destroyed their currency system; it was not accidentally done; they did not start out with inflation hoping to control it; they did not want to control it. They owed debts they could not pay. They could not possibly pay those debts. They did not want to repudiate them, they could not repudiate them; but they could print the money that these debts were payable in; and they deliberately and purposely printed that money in order to pay those debts, although the money was worthless. A carpenter could work half a day and pay off a $10,000 mortgage. A farmer could raise a bushel of wheat and pay off all the debts of a lifetime; but they destroyed their currency in order to do it. In this country no one is hoping to go in that direction. We want a controlled expansion of the currency, a sufficient medium of exchange; that is all we want. We want people to be able to pay their debts with dollars that are worth approximately the same as those dollars were worth when they were borrowed. That is all the people of this country want. In order to do this, however, Congress has got to reassume its constitutional duty to coin money and regulate its value. Under our present system this great privilege and right has been farmed out to the banks of the country; and remember when these banks have a right to make this money and charge people for the Government's credit, a blanket mortgage on all the property of all the people, those banks that have this great privilege are not even under the slightest obligation to maintain a sufficient circulating medium.

Mr. PATMAN. The following is inserted as a part of my extension:

MONEY-MANUFACTURING PLANTS

There are 15,000 money-manufacturing plants; 10,000 of them are State banks and 5,000 are national banks.

In order for them to make money, people must give notes to these banks and get a credit in the form of a demand deposit. In order to decrease demand deposits or deposit currency, loans are called and paid, which cancel the demand deposits or money. In order to increase the circulating medium, someone must go in debt and pay interest.

Fifteen years ago there were 30,000 of such banks. The number has been reduced one-half, which reduces the opportunity of the people to increase the circulating medium through loans.

EARNINGS OF BANKS

The total earnings of these banks in 1933 aggregated $1,700,000,000. Their net earnings aggregated $525,000,000. These banks have almost ceased to function as intended; all the banks are not responsible. The great privilege has been farmed out to them of lending on an average of $10 to every $1 that they have available. They are not even required or obligated in any way to maintain a sufficient circulating medium of exchange. They are given this privilege, and they can honestly and legitimately use it for their own selfish, greedy advantage, without regard to the general welfare and under no obligation whatsoever to serve the general welfare.

CONGRESS RESPONSIBLE

Congress has allowed this privilege to continue, notwithstanding the constitutional requirement that Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof.

THREE STATES HAVE ONE-HALF DEPOSITS

The time and demand deposits aggregate about $41,000,-000,000. One-half of this amount is in three States-New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

DEPOSIT CURRENCY

Demand deposits subject to check serve the same purpose clamor and sound paper money which had a base behind it, as currency and are referred to as deposit currency. From 1926 to 1929, inclusive, these deposits amounted to $21,000,- [ 000,000. At the end of the fiscal year in 1934 they amounted to $14,000,000,000. Therefore, these banks destroyed $7,000,-000,000 of our circulating medium, whereas the actual money outstanding, including paper money and coins, has remained practically the same-about $5,000,000,000-for 15 years.

It seems to be all right for the banks to destroy $7,000,-000,000 circulating medium, but if some of us attempt to restore $2,000,000,000 of that circulating medium, we are immediately branded as radicals and flat-money advocates.

These 15,000 money-manufacturing institutions engage principally in bookkeeping and pencil-mark transactions, but they have at their disposal the Bureau of Engraving and Printing at Washington, which is a stand-by for the purpose of furnishing the actual currency in greenback form when needed.

BANKS AS WELL AS PEOPLE VICTIMS

Let it be understood that I am not opposing individual banks or individual bankers. I am not criticizing them, but I am opposing a system that many of the banks, as well as the people, are victims of.

ISSUE DOLLAR BILL INSTEAD OF DOLLAR BOND

We must have banks. We want safe banks for the people's deposits. Personally, I prefer a 100-percent reserve for all banks and let the Government make the money on the issuance of credit. We will have no more bank failures. These 15,000 banks, having no sort of proper control, have ceased to function as such and are now commercial bookkeepers for hire and holders of Government bonds. These banks hold about $13,000,000,000 in United States Government bonds, and they receive annually about $400,000,000 in interest on these bonds. This is a pure subsidy. The Government should not pay interest on its own credit, and as Thomas Edison said:

If the Government can issue a dollar bond, providing for interest, that is good, it can issue a dollar bill that is good.

The banks do not pay one penny tax on these bonds to either the local government or the Federal Government.

If the 100-percent reserve requirement is enacted, we can pay off the national debt and save approximately a billion dollars a year in interest charges.

ONE-EIGHTH OF 1-PERCENT INTEREST RATE

Further, we can refinance the bonds of States, counties, and municipalities which were sold for the purpose of obtaining funds to make public improvements and for educational purposes. This refinancing should be done in a way that the interest rate will not exceed cost to the Government less than one-eighth of 1-percent annual interest. Improvement bonds in the future should be taken up by the Government at the same rate. This will reduce taxes at least 50 percent on the people, including farmers and home owners and other owners of real estate and tangible properties who are the least able to pay anything. One-half the average tax bill is for interest on bonds.

(This statement prepared by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. Mr. L. H. Parker, Chief of Staff.)

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Johnson of West Virginia, indefinitely, on account of illness.

"PINK SLIP" PUBLICITY—A GOVERNMENTAL INVASION OF THE PRIVATE RIGHTS AND SECURITY OF THE CITIZEN

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss a question which I believe goes to the very fundamentals of our rights and privileges as American citizens-whether or not the personal relationship of the private citizen to his Government on matters pertaining between them alone shall be publicly exposed and exploited.

I refer, of course, to the natural and inherent right of privacy that every law-abiding man and woman has under a democratic form of government, and more specifically to the jeopardy of those rights through the publication of everyone's intimate business and personal affairs through the famous "pink slip" publicity clause in the Revenue Act of 1934.

It appeals to me as a natural, and particularly an American, concept that a citizen's relations with his Government on tax matters, where the general public interest does not otherwise decree, should be inviolate and of necessity should | be held in confidence as against every third person.

While much public sentiment has been aroused, I do not believe it has yet addressed itself adequately to the fundamental and underlying principle that is involved-whether such confidential relations and knowledge shall be published for the use of third persons who cannot possibly justify any logical social right to them.

Involved in the question also, and inseparably mixed with it, is the citizen's right to personal security, which I feel will be seriously jeopardized through the promiscuous broadcasting of the details of his personal and private affairs.

The right to privacy and security has come down to us through the centuries. It is a natural and inherent right.

It is not a gift of law; it is a gift from our forefathers. should be ours to bequeath on. It is a right independently secured, rooted in developing customs, and recognized by the old common law. It is not such a right that can be capriciously breached or its meaning twisted by new or uncommon interpretations.

But, whether we fully realize it or not, I can see the beginning of a destruction of this inherent and natural right, of this peculiarly American concept of the right to privacy and security. That this threat touches only one group in our country does not affect the principle.

This indefensible situation has been gradually and insidiously developing. Probably unnoticed or not seriously considered by the average citizen as exposing him to any dangerous loss of rights, he has suddenly become faced with the naked realization of all that is involved.

Like so many other governmental policies and tendencies, the growth has been through slight deviations and indirect approaches. In times of depression or national disturbances, this tendency is generally unnoticed, because then the average citizen's vigilance is caught off guard by the necessity of giving practically exclusive consideration to the necessities of his own circumstances, and it is also the time when he may be more or less passive in accepting new laws and rules, which are held out to him as being vitally necessary in the proper running of the country's economic machine.

And so, in the case of the infamous "pink slip" publicity provision of law the citizen finally wakes up, and perhaps too late to defend himself.

In the discussions attending the submission of the incometax amendment to the people, it was emphatically stated by leaders of all political parties that the information obtained by the Government in levying income taxes would be confidential. At that time this question was very much in the minds of the American Congress, the State legislatures that ratified the amendment, and the American people. And thus we find in the original act of 1913 it was specifically provided that all income-tax returns should be open to inspection only by explicit order of the President himself, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and having the express approval of the President.

This provision of law was carried intact in all subsequent revenue acts down to 1924. The right given to the President to provide for the inspection of returns, presumably contemplated the possible development of some situation where it would be distinctly in the public interest to have the returns opened to scrutiny. It was no doubt felt that in extraordinary circumstances and where the public interest or the common good demanded it, the right to provide for inspection of income-tax returns should lie within the authority of the President. But conversely, it is fair to assume that the recognition of the confidential relationship between the citizen and his Government in income-tax matters would be held inviolate and not be subjected to transgression except the public interest or the common good demanded it.

So up to 1924 this policy prevailed. However, in that year we find the first definite translation of the agitation to make public income-tax returns. The 1924 law provided that income taxes paid should be made available to public inspection in the office of the collector of internal revenue in each district and any other place the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should determine. The information that was required to be made public consisted of the name and the post-office address of each person making an incometax return together with the amount of the income tax paid by each person. In the 1924 act also was included the requirement giving to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or any special committee of either House or Senate, the right to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for any data contained in income-tax returns for their inspection and scrutiny.

This latter provision was as patently in the public interest as the first was not. And this latter provision, also, has been in the law since and is in the law now.

But the provision in the 1924 act providing for the exposure of the tax paid to anybody and everybody was the successful beginning of that insistence for full publicity, especially from certain quarters, which finally led to the present pink slip" provision.

The results of the 1924 provision were misleading, harmful, and generally unfortunate. An aroused citizenship demanded its repeal. The officials of the Treasury themselves testified that no useful purpose was served, and they themselves recommended the repeal of the law. Thus, after the harmful experience of the 1924 law the provision was repealed in the act of 1926.

But agitation for full publicity did not die with the repeal of the 1924 law. The flame of its enthusiasm burned brightly or dimly in the intervening years, depending entirely on the position of the political weathercock, and also, it must be said, on the degree of reception to demagogic appeals to class distinctions which were aroused for obviously selfish political purposes.

I do not include in this charge sincere friends of tax publicity, although I distinctly question the soundness of their reasoning. But in the main the agitation was kept alive by politicians, in and out of Congress, who humbugged some people into thinking that publicity would bring an end to

In the consideration of the 1932 act a particularly determined effort was made to provide for full publicity, not only of the tax paid, but of every item of whatsoever kind that would be included in the return. This was defeated. And, generally, the right remained in the President to provide for inspections in his discretion when presumably the public interest demanded disclosure.

But the movement toward mandatory and full publication continued on. And in the 1934 act we see included, for the first time, a provision for obligatory income-tax publicity. There we find the addition of the infamous section 55 (b), which provides for the full publication of the information required by the notorious pink slip.

This "pink slip" which all taxpayers have received, requires that the following information be given:

The name and address of the taxpayer; total gross income; total deductions; net income; total credits against net income; and tax payable.

There is no longer any safeguard thrown around this publicity provision—that publicity shall be subject only to rules and regulations prescribed by the Treasury and approved by the President. This is mandatory, and whether the President wills or not, the publicity must be given. I am informed that the Treasury Department feels that in order to carry out the letter and spirit of this section they will feel obligated to furnish to anyone the "pink slip" information.

This means, in a practical way, that sometime after the 15th of March there will be furnished to the press of the country tabulated lists of all those who have filed a return, whether they pay a tax or not. To put it more concretely, every single man or woman who has a net income of $1,000 a year or over and every married man or woman who has a net income of $2,500 a year or over will appear on the tabulations that will be furnished to the press of the country.

Every little country newspaper, if it can afford to give space for this free and delectable advertising, can parade the list on its front page of those living in the towns and villages within their circulations. Every newspaper in the to Washington or the different internal-revenue offices for the information exposing the intimate affairs of the people in their communities to the public gaze.

This is the situation that confronts us today. I am here tonight to appeal to you and all other honest citizens to join together in a nonpartisan and nonpolitical effort to repeal this obnoxious section. I say nonpolitical and nonpartisan advisedly, because I want to recall to your mind the fact that when this section was introduced in the Revenue Act of 1934 it was not advocated or supported by the President or by his Secretary of the Treasury. This section was not in the revenue bill as it came to the House originally. It slipped into the law during the closing days of the last Congress as the final result of an amendment adopted by the Senate providing for full publicity of the entire return. This amendment was offered by Senator La Follette and carried by 7 votes, with 21 Senators absent

The amendment of Senator LA FOLLETTE went much further than the "pink slip" amendment, and when the bill went to conference all the House conferees could do was to modify it as much as they could. The result of this modification is the present "pink slip" section. The conference report came up in the House and was adopted without a roll call in the closing days, and so the "pink slip" section became a law with the President's signature of the revenue bill. It was felt that the compromise, bad as it was, was the best that could be obtained without jeopardizing the passage of the revenue bill

I want to emphasize, however, again that this proposal was not recommended by the administration. I do not know how it feels toward the "pink slip" section. I should like to know. But, having in mind the fact that it has never availed itself of the right to order public inspections of returns heretofore, I have every hope that the administration will favor its repeal when the time comes.

On February 8 I introduced a bill to repeal section 55 (b). the "pink slip" section, and this measure is now before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The chairman of the committee and the Speaker of the House have both publicly declared themselves in favor of the repeal of this section. I have requested a hearing and action on my bill. and have been informed that the committee cannot take up this bill or any similar bill until after they have disposed of what is known as the "Economic Security Act", involving old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, and also the different bonus measures. These two measures will take a long time, and hearings on both may be lengthy. However, the proposal to repeal this section is a very simple matter and should not take more than an hour's discussion before coming to a decision.

Let us now turn to the implications and results that will occur should the Congress take no action looking toward the repeal of this section. And in fairness, also, let us examine first the claims of the proponents of this proposal.

In all the years of income-tax publicity agitation, the alleged primary purpose of the movement's leading cru-saders is the prevention of tax evasions. They have gone on the theory that full publicity would deter and frighten the potential taxpayer who was flirting with schemes to defraud his government; that full publicity would wield a psychological effect in inducing such honesty as greatly to augment the Government's income. They have argued that the burning light of publicity would make a man think twice before he adopted ingenious schemes to establish losses for deduction purposes, and so keep down his taxes; that it would prevent him from claiming offsets to which he was not entitled; that it would materially cut down the instances of shocking tax evasions that have been brought to light within the past few years.

The argument has been made that to assure secrecy would also assure trickery and fraud on the part of the taxpayer, and that, therefore, it was necessary and in the public interest to expose the returns to public inspection. And one particularly strange suggestion that has been advanced is that it would provide a full opportunity for employees of the country, whether a city daily or a country weekly, will rush | Internal Revenue Bureau, on their own responsibility, to run to Members of Congress and of the Senate and advise them of the things that were rotten, not in Denmark but in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

However, these arguments may apply either to the alleged benefits to be gained from full publicity, or under the "pink slip" section, I think it is pretty obvious that they contemplate the presumption of crookedness against the taxpayer. And so far as the Internal Revenue Bureau is concerned it is a rather sad commentary on administration. But admitting for the sake of the discussion that there may be individual instances where taxpayers might resort to false and fraudulent returns, the arguments of the proponents of publicity still remain an indictment of the whole body of taxpayers as a class.

It is here that I think they lose their proper sense of perspective. I do not think they themselves seriously believe that the great body of taxpayers want to defraud the Government. However, the conscientious publicity proponent is so obsessed with the idea of reaching the big and wealthy tax evader that he entirely loses sight of the effects of publicity on that vast majority of citizens whose incomes are moderate, over 90 percent of whom are in the classes with incomes ranging from $1,000 up to $5,000.

The honest publicity proponents want to expose the wealthy corporation tax evader. Here again they fall into error in thinking that all corporations are wealthy.

In both cases the publicity proponents are seemingly willing to ruthlessly sacrifice over nine-tenths of all those making returns in order to get the returns of individuals and corporations of large wealth spread out to the scrutiny of

But returning to the "pink slip" and the information it requires, is it to be expected that this requirement will frighten a man into reporting an income he might otherwise conceal; or of making him think twice before he establishes a fictitious loss; or of claiming offsets to which he is not entitled? Hardly. So far as inducing the reporting of a taxable income is concerned, our experience with the 1924 act demonstrates that it will not have any such effect. The psychological effect may well be that it will scare people into not making returns, for fear of the involved publicity.

So far as the other arguments for publicity are concerned, that there is some advantage of utility to the Government in preventing the establishment of fictitious losses and offsets, or collusion between employees of the Internal Revenue Bureau and the taxpayers, I can only answer that the "pink slip" disclosure contains no essence of information that would be of any utility in reaching such evasions. It cannot possibly, by any stretch of the imagination, give any information which might show the juggling of a man's income-tax items. If there is any juggling the Government is in a full position, already, to detect it, because it has the full return in its files, item by item.

There has been honest and dishonest salesmanship of income-tax publicity as a policy. I cannot agree with the reasoning advanced by those honestly adhering to the view of its usefulness in the public interest.

But more often than not, in my estimation, this agitation for publicity has been boiled in the cooking pots of demagogues whose ulterior motives are not the public interest but class cleavage and the creation of class hatreds.

Their appeal for support of their aims has not been one based on exposition and reasoning, but on oratory and bombast calculated to bring distortion to the average man's viewpoint. The effects of their agitation can but breed discord and mutual distrust.

And where their efforts have not been organized with any definite objective in mind the most kindly thing I can say is I suspect it is their hope that with the advent of full publicity for income taxes, or even of the "pink slip" provision, they will be afforded generous opportunities to go on fishing expeditions which will assure them a fair catch-of notoriety and free space in the country's press.

I cannot agree that these "pink slips", these infamous writs of assistance to snoopers, will freshen the flow of revenue into the Treasury. Rather, they will serve to dam it up. The more obstacles and obstructions we place in the taxpayer's way the more the element of reluctance will appear in his cooperation.

The ideal income-tax provisions would, of course, be those that would create a natural and automatic flow of revenues to the Treasury and that would obviate the necessity of having the vast auditing and checking machinery in vogue, the upkeep of which is in itself an expensive item. Simplicity of return requirements may aid in this direction, but if we are to get full cooperation from the taxpayers, we must presume their honesty, we must respect their confidence, and hold out the hand not of oppression but of cooperation.

To legislate a presumption of crookedness against the taxpayer, as the "pink slip" section does, will not help. It will hurt, and under the "pink slip" section I see a definite en-couragement to tax evasion. In this I am generally supported, I believe, by a statement made by the Treasury Department in the hearings on the 1926 revenue bill, which declared:

There is a provision in the present act (1924) for publicity of the amount of tax paid by every taxpayer. The publicity is utterly useless from a Treasury standpoint. * * * All of the supervising internal-revenue agents report that no additional tax has been collected due to the publicity provision, and all of them recommend its repeal. * * The returns and all information in connection therewith are readily available to the Treasury. The in connection therewith are readily available to the Treasury. The amount of tax paid is no true indication of the income of the individual. There are all kinds of losses and deductions. To make publicity complete would expose every trade secret to the tax-payer's competitor. It would do nothing to aid the Treasury or to increase the Government revenue. On the contrary, publicity encourages further tax evasion and loss of revenue. There is no excuse for the present publicity provision except the gratification of idle curiosity. * * No other country I know of publishes this information. Why should we in a free country insist on the exposure of the personal affairs of our citizens to the world?

In this connection allow me to draw from the experience of Wisconsin with the publication of income-tax returns. Wisconsin is the only State that has such a law on its books today. In 1930 the Wisconsin Tax Commission, in its formal report, said:

The repeal of the secrecy clause by the 1923 legislature opened all income-tax returns to public inspection. The repeal was urged and passed upon the supposition that public inspection would result in fewer incorrect returns and in discovering much unreported income. These expected results have not materialized in any degree in the administration of either the individual or the corporation returns. There have been no instances where public inspection has brought forth unreported income; and as to its anticipated effect in producing more correct income returns, experience has shown that it has had the opposite effect. Knowing that their returns are open to inspection, taxpayers consolidate and condense their reports to make them as unintelligible as possible to those inspecting them, thus making their auditing by the commission or by the income-tax assessor more arduous, necessitating additional work, considerably more correspondence, and consequent

The commission does not favor any secrecy of returns that would bar examinations in the public interest, but it does suggest that the promiscuous misuse of files for private purposes, to the great inconvenience and annoyance of officials and the expense of the State; ought to be discontinued. No other State or country having such files in custody permits such misuse of them. These files contain the record of the lifeblood and register the pulse of the person and private business affairs of our own taxpayers and should be accessible only when the public interest is concerned.

And on this general point let us see the practice of England. The mother country emphatically does not permit publicity of income-tax returns. In fact, the inspector or surveyor of taxes in Great Britain, who corresponds to our revenue agent, cannot even go to the original books of the taxpayer as a matter of right. The inspector of taxes, on taking office, takes an oath promising not to make public information in respect to income-tax returns.

In the United States appeals in the great majority of cases go to the Board of Tax Appeals, whose hearings have always been public. In Great Britain the general and special commissioners perform the appeal function of our Board of Tax Appeals, and the hearings before such commissioners are secret. The only time a person's income-tax case becomes wholly or partly public in Great Britain is when a case is appealed from the decision of the general or special commissioners to the King's bench division of the high court of of the Wisconsin income-tax returns was in the preparajudicature. I have been told by an expert of eminancethese have been his words practically verbatim—that there can be no doubt that Great Britain has pursued a policy of still greater secrecy in income-tax matters than has ever been pursued in this country even before the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1934.

And the highest judicial authority in our land, the United States Supreme Court, has signified its recognition of the serious effects that might flow from not properly safeguarded disclosures of income-tax returns. In one case before it they declared:

The interests of persons compelled, under the revenue laws, to furnish information as to their private business affairs would often be seriously affected if the disclosures so made were not properly

Let me remind you here that the repeal of this section will in no way affect other provisions of the act making available all income-tax details to the Treasury Department, the committees of Congress, and to States and municipalities which have the right to ask this information of the Federal Government, and even for publication if the President should see fit. Thus the rights of the Government would continue to be fully protected.

Now to turn to some of the evil effects that will flow if this provision is not repealed. Let us try to visualize some of the direct consequences and at the same time balance them against the alleged benefits of publicity. Who will be the most interested parties to scan the publication of these returns? First of all the idle curious, the gossip, and those who take pleasure in snooping into other people's business. Picture, if you will, to yourselves the idle gossips around a country store or the country post office going over the publication of these returns in the local country weekly.

Offhand this might seem to be an innocent pastime. the amusement, such as it may give, were simply enjoyed for the moment and the information immediately forgotten, the results would not be particularly worrisome. However, in idle and prurient gossip we have a distinct outrage on the citizen's feelings. The man or woman on the advertised list, and their families, become not only the butt for humor of a sort but for malicious stories. All those in the community on the list will be talked about, wondered about; talk will beget talk until ill feelings are bound to become engendered, resulting in the creation of social discord and in definite damage to social standards.

But far more serious than the idle gossip are those classes of people who make it a business of compiling sucker lists to sell. We all know that despite the enactment of the Securities and Exchange Act that there are still going about this land glib salesmen selling fake securities to the gullible, either through the mails or by house-to-house canvasses. With what glee will these issuers of fake securities pounce upon the list of citizens who have a net income of over a thousand dollars a year! The widow or the woman living alone with a small or moderate, or even a comfortable, income will be immediately preyed upon by these contemptible

You can all readily think of the many kinds of importunities that citizens will be subjected to-the book agent, the fake charity racket, crooked real-estate salesmen, poor relatives, and so on-will all welcome these sucker lists and this information.

During the last few years the daily newspapers have been filled with accounts of racketeers, blackmailers, and kidnapers. In my opinion the publication of these lists will be one of the greatest incentives to crime that can possibly be imagined. The Dillingers, the Carpis, and the "Baby Face" Nelsons and their ilk will eagerly scan each list in his own community for a clue as to possible profitable victims. So far as this criminal element is concerned, the Government, in effect, will be furnishing a "who's who" list of prospects. It might just as well furnish these lists to the kidnaper and racketeer direct and be done with it.

I have referred to the Wisconsin law, and you may be interested to know that the main use made of the publication tion of lists that were hawked about and sold to those who had no legitimate reason for having them. The result was such a scandal that the Wisconsin Legislature in 1933 was obliged to pass a law to prevent the sale of these lists by those who were hawking them about, and they imposed a severe penalty, a fine or imprisonment, or both.

And let me remind you, in connection with the "pink slip" provision, that there is no safeguard thrown around its publication similar to that afforded by the Wisconsin law. We intend to dish out this information indiscriminately, to permit its compilation and sale, in whole or in part, and for the use of any who may desire it.

One of the most serious abuses that will be brought about by this section is the publication of business information to a man's competitor, and I am not at this moment thinking of large business or industry, as such; but the smaller business men in the cities, and the small merchants in the towns of the country. The disclosure of his intimate business and financial set-up will be eagerly scanned by his competitors and by his creditors.

We have been going through a depression. Many businesses have necessarily met with reverses and many are in the red. To parade their misfortunes at this time particularly would be the height of folly and would retard business recovery. In some cases the small business man's credit might be so affected that it would drive him to the wall. Many individuals have suffered losses in the past 2 years. They have been courageously trying to recover; many are skating on thin ice. To suddenly throw the light of such publicity on their intimate business affairs not only will hurt their credit, if not jeopardize it, but will submit them to unnecessary humiliation and discouragement, and in many instances may thoroughly break down their morale.

In advocating the repeal of this section I have not thought primarily of the man of large means but of the man who groups himself in the smaller brackets, where over 90 percent or more of all the returns are represented. The world knows who the large taxpayers are; the world knows those who have large incomes. Whether their incomes this year or next year, or any year, will be smaller or larger than the public might have expected may be of passing interest, but it will not cause particular comment.

I am primarily concerned with the man or woman, the smaller industry or business, in the lower brackets. They are the ones who will be most seriously injured. They are the ones who live in the smaller towns of the country, and they are the ones who will have to bear the humiliation and see their private affairs spread out on the front page of their country weekly. Many people seem to think that this publicity affects only those of wealth. I cannot too strongly emphasize again that it affects every single man with a net income of a thousand dollars and every married man with a net income of $2,500 or over, and this whether he pays

I have had a large mail, bringing in protests from all parts of the country. I have yet to identify a single man or woman who has written me as a person of large means. The big body of protests has come from small merchants and business men throughout the country who are concerned over the parading of their intimate business affairs in the press.

And there is the professional man who may not want to advertise his success or have his failure exposed. In this connection it must be remembered that the information on the "pink slips" may be entirely false as to a man's success or failure. A doctor may have sustained a severe loss in the stock market which would wipe out his taxable income, and yet he might be paraded before the world as an unsuccessful doctor without patients. The same thing applies to the lawyer, and in fact to every other professional man.

On the other hand, in the case of the doctor, a small country physician may have made a successful speculation in real estate. His return for the year might be three or five times his ordinary income. We all know that lawyers and doctors are having considerable difficulty collecting their fees at the present time. In the case I have cited his difficulty might be increased tenfold.

I cannot begin, in the short space of an evening, to uncover all the ramifications, embarrassments, distress, humiliation, and discouragements that will put themselves in the way of the smaller taxpayers unless this section is repealed.

There has been a tendency in Washington of late to throw obstruction in the way of business. I, for one, am ready to believe that 99.99 percent of American business men. industrialists, and professional men are honest and lawabiding American citizens.

There are some people, of course, who have been too prone to judge the large majority by the backslidings of the very few. We cannot base our laws in consideration of a small criminal element. If this country is to recover, it will only recover through the common sense, genius, and application to business of the average American. Government should give him a chance; government should assume he is honest, as we all know him to be. This publicity clause is but another obstacle in the way of recovery. I, for one, believe that these obstacles, and this one in particular, should be removed so that the honest, law-abiding American can have a chance to go ahead without the worry and fear of the dead hand of government being stretched out to search and expose and exploit his private intimate business affairs.

I want for a moment to recur again to the broad considerations of principle involved in this question. They are not light or transient. They distinctly affect not only our indefeasible right to privacy and security but the happiness of our lives.

Whether I have persuaded your agreement with my viewpoint or not, I feel that our privileges as free citizens are jeopardized by the "pink slip" clause in question.

There is the distinct deprivation of the right of privacy, and there is the jeopardy to our personal security. This may not be immediate, but it exists; our personal security is lessened, not only through fear but by the real threats that are within the range of probability.

In the complex composition of our population we have unfortunately progressed to a point where crime is organized. "Make war on crime" is now a catch phrase. If we admit, as we must, too large an existence of criminal elements and ingenious means to take advantage of information respecting an individual's private income, it is distinctly against the public interest to take any step which would lessen our security from such attacks. If we admit there are risks, then the "pink slip" clause definitely jeopardizes our personal security. It subjects the taxpayer not only to the loss of his privacy but to real fears and disquiet and distress without leaving him with any defense.

The provision smothers the guaranties of privacy and security.

It promotes trespass, even if it is only through the eve.

It is abhorrent to our sense of fair play.

If we remain passive, submissive; if we yield and submit to this rape of our rights; if we prostrate and bow ourselves low, where will the end be?

Will not our timid submission to the publicity section lay us open and make us more vulnerable to even more repulsive governmental practices?

THE 30-HOUR WEEK AND THE MONOPOLY OF THE RADIO

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein an address delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] over station WEVD on the 30-hour-week bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following radio address delivered by Hon. WILLIAM CONNERY, of Massachusetts, over station WEVD of New York City on the 30-hour week and the Monopoly of the Radio, February 21, 1935:

Friends of WEVD I greet you.

It is a pleasure and a privilege to address the many thousands of industrial workers who make possible the continuation of this real labor station.

The problems of labor—of the industrial workers—were never greater than they are at the present time. With 11,000,000 or more unemployed; with many millions dependent upon Government relief for even a mere existence; with ruthless and callous-hearted her for even a mere existence; with ruthless and callous-nearted captains of industry continuing to exploit the unorganized workers in order that they may pile up additional millions of mere dollars; with social-service workers employed by the Government, most of them receiving large salaries, invading the homes of the workers and virtually telling them what they can eat and where they can live, it is only the strength of the organized labor movement—the American Federation of Labor and its constituent national and interestical labor unloss which protects the labor. tional and international labor unions—which protects the industrial workers of our country from being forced back to where we were before we emerged from serfdom.

were before we emerged from serfdom.

President Roosevelt has just asked Congress to continue the National Industrial Recovery Act for another 2-year period. President Roosevelt rightfully states that the N. I. R. A. has virtually abolished child labor; has reduced the hours of labor in most cases to 40 per week, which is too long; has eliminated the cutthroat competition existent in many industries, which was possible only through the sweating of the exploited workers, and had established minimum wages for most of our exploited workers.

Yet had the administration accepted the Connery 30-hour-workweek bill 2 years ago, which bill was unanimously reported to the House by the Labor Committee, of which I have the honor of being chairman, these good conditions would all be the law of the land today. This bill was reported out 2 months or more before the chairman, these good conditions would all be the law of the land today. This bill was reported out 2 months or more before the birth of the N. R. A. In addition, the Connery bill established a real partnership of the Government with labor and industry, with labor having equal representation on all boards created. Also the passage of the Connery bill would have provided employment for at least four and possibly six of the eleven or more millions of unemployed. These four or even six million industrial workers, employed at profitable wages, would have been able to care for themselves and their families without being dependent upon Government relief. ernment relief.

It will please you to know that yesterday the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 4 to 1 to report favorably the 30-hour-work week bill. I understand that the Senate Judi-ciary Committee will report this week favorably to the Senate after their meeting next Monday.

Every self-respecting American worker seeks work, not charity. Government figures show that if we are ever to emerge from this present depression it will be done only through providing profitable employment for our millions of American industrial workers. It is they who constitute the great mass of purchasing power which has made America the greatest country in the world.

The House Committee on Labor is now holding hearings on the Connery bill, which bill provides that labor shall have equal representation with employers on all boards, codes, and other agencies or commissions set up by our Government. We have representation with employers on all boards, codes, and other agencies or commissions set up by our Government. We have heard the testimony of several labor officials, and also we have listened to the testimony of Donald Richberg, one-time noted labor attorney, who is now referred to in Washington as the assistant President. While at one time labor looked to Richberg as their friend, that time has passed, and he has lately been severely criticized and condemned by the great officials of the labor move-

Testimony has been given to our committee indicating that the N. R. A. has failed due to the fact that most of the codes are the N. R. A. has failed due to the fact that most of the codes are controlled and operated by the very people Congress in enacting the N. R. A. set out to penalize—the ruthless and calloused captains of industry. The codes have failed in many instances, due entirely to the fact that very few of the codes provide for any representatives of the workers. The codes have failed because the N. R. A. has not properly enforced section 7A. This was the one section of the bill supposed to guarantee to labor the right to organize. The Congress struck out of the bill a proviso which would have legalized company unions. Yet company unionism, despite the expressed opposition of the Congress, has been recognized and permitted to function under rulings of Richberg and others. Richberg and others.

has been recognized and permitted to function under rulings of Richberg and others.

The testimony recently presented to the Committee on Labor by I. M. Ornburn, secretary of the union label trades department of the American Federation of Labor, and president of the Cigar Makers International Union, was most illuminating. Ornburn showed that the cigarette industry, represented for months in the N. R. A. by S. Clay Williams, Chairman of the Administrative Division of the N. R. A., recently put over a code for the cigarette industry which permits of the continued payment to the exploited workers of that industry wages as low as 12 cents per hour. This industry has earned greater profits during the last 4 depression years than they ever earned before. The labor cost of making cigarettes, we were shown, is less than 2 percent of the wholesale value of the cigarettes. That is the type of cooperation which President Roosevelt has received from the great captains of industry whom he placed in executive positions in the N. R. A. in his effort to bring back prosperity to America.

It was shown to our committee—and I am citing this industry simply as an illustration—that while the four large cigarette companies, which you might describe as the "trust", producing almost 90 percent of all the cigarettes produced in America, insisted that they be permitted to continue to exploit their workers, the two large independent cigarette companies, both unionized, who sell the 10-cent packages of cigarettes, were willing and wired the President of their willingness to subscribe to a code with wages 40 percent greater than those provided for in the code put over by the cigarette trust. The efforts of the unionized cigar manufacturers to better the conditions of the workers in that industry were in vain, as the influence of big business in the present set-up of N. R. A. is most apparent in Washington.

Incidentally, to show you the unfairness of present-day conditions, the Government imposes a flat tax of 6 cents per package of 20 cigarettes. When those cigarettes sell for 10 cents, which are the cigarettes put out by the unionized factories, the manufacturer has but 4 cents with which to pay for his token his labor, his the cigarettes put out by the unionized factories, the manufacturer has but 4 cents with which to pay for his tobacco, his labor, his printing, his overhead, and his profit; while the nonunion cigarettes, selling for 15 cents or two for a quarter, the product of the exploited workers of the nonunion cigarette manufacturers, after paying the tax of 6 cents, leaves the profiteering manufacturer 9 cents with which to pay for tobacco, his labor, etc.

Is it any wonder that President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress yesterday, said—I quote: "Monopolies and private price fixing within industries must not be allowed or condoned."

President Roosevelt has found that the large industries of this country—while millions of our workers were dependent upon the country—while millions of our workers were dependent upon the Government for relief—as a result of the operation of the N. R. A. had added thousands of millions of dollars in profits as a result of the long hours the workers are forced to work and the increased prices which have resulted through the suspension of the anti-trust laws.

Possibly it might be well to use the condition of your own radio station, WEVD, as a further example of how the great captains of industry exploit not only the workers of our country but even the properties of the country as well.

The radio-broadcasting industry is, on the whole, one of the most profitable industries we have. The radio-broadcasting industry as the results through a few parts of the radio-broadcasting industries we have.

try exists through a franchise, given to a licensee by the Federal Communications Commission, an agency of Congress. Congress has specifically stated that no holder of a radio license has any property right in the air. The license is renewable every 6 months, and that specification Congress laid down to eliminate, as it thought measured.

thought, monopoly.

Despite the fact that we have eleven or more millions of workers unemployed, and that most American industries are restricted to unemployed, and that most American industries are restricted to a 40-hour-work week, the radio broadcasting industry, child of the Power Trust, is able to force its workers to work 48 hours each week. And, apparently, there is no force in the N. R. A. or in the Federal Communications Commission strong enough or interested enough in the workers employed in the radio broadcasting industry to shorten these long hours. In addition, each of the two networks have created company unions, with the full knowledge of the officials of the N. R. A.

This radio station, WEVD, owned as I understand by representatives of the workers and operated for the benefit of the workers, is a legitimate, non-profit-making, labor, educational institution.

tives of the workers and operated for the benefit of the workers, is a legitimate, non-profit-making, labor, educational institution. One of your officers, David Dubinsky, president of the Ladies Garment Workers International Union, has lately been honored with elevation to a vice presidency of the American Federation of Labor. Officials of the American Federation of Labor, with whom I am in constant contact, tell me of the great work President Dubinsky has done for the workers of his industry.

As I stated to you a few moments ago, it was the intent of Congress, expressly written into the law that there was to be no

As I stated to you a few moments ago, it was the intent of Congress, expressly written into the law, that there was to be no monopoly in radio broadcasting. Senator Dill, recognized as an authority on radio legislation, stated on March 19, 1932, only 2 years ago—I quote: "Chain organizations are especially guilty of this (referring to attempted monopoly). The National Broadcasting Co. owns or controls 12 stations and most of them on cleared channels with high power. The Columbia owns 5 and controls 3 additional, most of which are on cleared channels with high power. The American people", continued Senator Dill, "will never permit the enlargement of this ownership to any great extent as a permanent policy", end of quotation. And yet, within 2 years of the making of that statement—and while Senator Dill was still a Member of the Senate—the National Broadcasting Co., the child of the Power Trust, added eight additional stations to their chains. Of course, you know, or you should know, that the National Broadcasting Co. is owned and controlled by the Power Trust, with M. H. Aylesworth, former managing director of the National Electric Light Association, in supreme command.

To refresh the memories of some of my listeners I might add

To refresh the memories of some of my listeners I might add that this same Mr. Aylesworth is the same gentleman the Federal Trade Commission, in its report on the Power Trust and public utilities, found expended or authorized the expenditure of large sums of money to influence college professors and teachers in our colleges and schools to write and to lecture on subjects helpful to the enlarged and continued profits of the Power Trust through the continued exploitation of the consumers of gas and electric lights.

Three years ago I was appealed to by representatives of the American Federation of Labor to sponsor legislation directing the Federal Radio Commission, the predecessor of the present Communications Commission, to assign a clear-channel wave length to munications Commission, to assign a clear-channel wave length to labor. As a result of the efforts put forth by the friends of the American Federation of Labor in the Congress of the United States, and to prevent the necessity of Congress assigning these invaluable radio facilities, the Federal Radio Commission prevailed upon the National Broadcasting Co. to consent to WCFL, the radio station operated by the Chicago Federation of Labor, having unlimited time with power of 5,000 watts on 970. The National Broadcasting Co. further agreed that no additional radio stations would be assigned to this wave length without the consent of the American Federation of Labor.

The American Federation of Labor recognized the value of their having a clear-channel wave length, and only at the last conven-having a clear-channel wave length, and only at the last convention they reaffirmed their demand for the continued ownership of this wave length, with the further stipulation that no radio station, other than those owned and controlled by labor, be placed on this wave length.

Last Saturday morning, while conversing with one of the news reporters in my office, I was amazed to learn that this wave length is no longer to be the property of the American Federation of Labor, but that additional commercial radio stations in Albany, N. Y., Fort Worth, Tex., and Miami, Fla., are to be placed on the same wave

While I am Chairman of the House Committee on Labor, I am not an officer of the American Federation of Labor, and I do not interfere in the internal affairs of the organization.

However, knowing of the good work your radio station has done in the past and realizing how much greater work your radio station would do if it had a more desirable wave length with addistation would do if it had a more desirable wave length with additional power and unlimited hours, instead of the miserly hours and low power now assigned to you, I voluntarily wrote to the members of the Broadcast Division of the Federal Communications Commission and protested against other stations being assigned to this labor wave length. I also suggested that if they were going to destroy this property of labor by permitting other commercial interests the use of it, that they ought to consider your problem and give this legitimate labor radio station—WEVD—an opportunity of being placed on this wave length.

Former Congressman Anning Prail, of Staten Island, is now the Chairman of the Broadcast Division, and he answered my letter. He suggested that there are other stations in New York which might be interfered with if my suggestion was carried out.

ter. He suggested that there are other stations in New York which might be interfered with if my suggestion was carried out. My answer to Chairman Prall and to the other members of the Communications Commission is that where there is a will there is a way, and if there is an honest desire on the part of the Commission to give labor in New York a real opportunity of broadcasting to the millions of industrial workers of Greater New York they will easily make the necessary transfers of radio facilities.

However, I was amazed to learn only yesterday of the contempt which the profiteers in radio broadcasting have for the Federal Communications Commission, a Government agency.

It is understood that some weeks ago a number of gentlemen interested in radio met in a hotel room or in a lawyer's office and proceeded, under the direction of a representative of the Power proceeded, under the direction of a representative of the Power Trust, to divide up this radio wave length which we, in Congress, definitely understood was the property of the American Federation of Labor of Labor.

Not only did they actually divide up this property, but they entered into a written agreement, signed and sealed, setting forth the rights of each of the parties, and, then they handed in to the Federal Communications Commission their findings with a request that this governmental agency, supposedly an agency of the Congress of the United States, approve of their action.

To indicate further the monopoly which exists in radio broadcasting, let me illustrate by comparing the radio properties in New York City of the two networks with all other radio properties.

There are 13 radio stations in New York City. One is owned by the city, but is not allowed to operate at night. One station, owned and operated by the Paulist Fathers, an organization which has done wonderful work all over this country, a non-profit-making body, is licensed to operate only 15 hours per week. Seven other radio stations either share time or are not allowed to operate at night. Two other stations, with low power, are permitted to broadcast unlimited hours. The three radio stations owned and operated by the two networks are allowed to broadcast on 50,000 watts with unlimited hours on the most desirable wave lengths. with unlimited hours on the most desirable wave lengths.

Is there a radio monopoly? Surely I have given you the answer. Incidentally, one of these New York high-powered stations, operating unlimited hours, is licensed to a radio manufacturing company and leased to the network owned by the Power Trust.

I should have much preserred to have discussed for your benefit additional labor problems, but, personally, I thought it more fitting, in view of the happenings of the past week and the possible effect upon your radio station WEVD, that you have a knowledge of the power of monopoly. It is due principally to this monopoly in radio that your station is forced to operate on such an undesirable wave length and to share time with other stations.

What is true of monopoly in radio broadcasting is true of monopoly in other industries.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a speech made by the Postmaster General at the dedication of a public building in Sarasota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following address made by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General of the United States, at the dedication of the new Federal building at Sarasota, Fla., on Friday February 15,

My activities have carried me to all parts of the United States, especially to the larger centers of population; but in all my travels I have never visited any State or community that has given ravels I have never visited any State or community that has given me more pleasure than a visit to Florida at this season of the year. Your balmy breezes, your invigorating sunshine, and your outdoor life bring health and happiness to everyone who has the good fortune to live here. There is a special advantage in coming to Sarasota, where we find people from every section of the country, all thoroughly enjoying the benefits of your wonderful climate. It is eminently fitting that on the occasion of the dedication of this Federal building that so many residents of other parts of the country should join with the people of Sarasota in these exercises. The dedication of a Government building, which is a symbol of The dedication of a Government building, which is a symbol of the United States Government—your Government and mine—in-spires in every America citizen a deep and wholesome regard for his country and its institutions.

The bonds of patriotism bind us together in mutual affection for our country, regardless of the State or section from which we may come.

Our post offices supply one of the most beneficient objects of Our post offices supply one of the most beneficient objects of government. They are a means of communication which bind friends and families together, shorten and relieve the absence of loved ones, facilitate business and trade, and promote good will. They should be conducted with the utmost integrity and efficiency. They should also be conducted with economy, bearing in mind that service to the public is the first consideration.

When I took over the management of the Post Office Department on March 4, 1933, President Roosevelt directed that so far as possible the people be relieved of the tremendous tax burdens of postal deficits. These deficits had been increasing from year to year during prior administrations, and when I assumed office I found that the Department had operated during the previous year at a loss of $153,000,000.

at a loss of $153,000,000.

I caused a survey to be made and we instituted a policy of economy, with special attention toward the elimination of waste. We found that there had been a great decline in the volume of mail. We had an estimated surplus of personnel amounting to approximately 15,000 employees.

By diligent effort and the loyal cooperation of the officers and employees of the Postal Service throughout the United States, we were able, in the first full year of the administration, to eliminate the deficit, and last year we had a surplus of over $12,000,000.

The postal deficit was eliminated by the same means any prudent business man would use in trying to save his business when he saw it going on the rocks.

saw it going on the rocks.

By not filling vacancies caused by deaths, resignations, and removals for cause among our employees, and through retirement on pension, we were able to solve the problem of the surplus employees. Through this method we were able to care for our surplus personnel without the arbitrary removal of a single employee in any part of the United States, and without the drastic salary cuts such as occurred in private industry amounting at times to 50 percent.

A rigid investigation of our transportation service disconting

A rigid investigation of our transportation service, discontinuance of duplicated service, and better terms in the reletting of contracts, effected savings of over $14,000,000 during the same

We did not stop there but continued our work of saving the people's money. On our supplies and equipment we saved over $6,000,000. On our post-office leases we saved over $3,000,000. We reduced our travel expenses by more than $1,000,000. And on reduced our travel expenses by more than $1,000,000. And on odds and ends, we saved approximately $275,000.

We feel that we have answered the demand of the people as expressed by the President for relief from the burdensome tax of a postal deficit. It has been done without impairing the service. In fact, increasing business has warranted increased service, and it has been supplied.

Last April, I called before me 25 experienced post-office inspectors and had them make a Nation-wide survey for complaints of in-adequate service and to determine the need for increased facilities. As a result, some 1,885 clerks and carriers were added to the force, and additional service provided. Complaints of unsatisfactory service are now rare and when received they are promptly adjusted.

We shall endeavor to keep the Post Office Department on a self-sustaining basis and believe we shall have the earnest support of the people and Congress in this purpose.

I recommend the retention of the present 3-cent postage rate on letter mail. A reduction of a penny on first-class postage would mean a loss of revenue amounting to $75,000,000 annually. I believe the people who use the mails are willing to pay the additional penny rather than have this tax loaded on the backs of the taxnaying public. A reduction of the 2 centuries that of the taxpaying public. A reduction of the 3-cent rate should not come until the mails have increased in sufficient volume to warrant such a reduction.

The financial outlook in the Post Office Department is encouraging. Reviving business in the industrial, financial, and agricultural world is being reflected in our increasing post-office receipts throughout the Nation. The people of the United States have weathered the storms of adversity, the sunshine of prosperity is beginning again to brighten our land, and you of Florida have done your part to bring this about.

The Post Office Department is your own organization. You should patronize it to the fullest extent. The service rendered is inexpensive, safe, and swift.

Our organization in Washington and in the field, down to the

Our organization in Washington and in the field, down to the last man, is devoted to your service. It is a body of trained experts. At the present time there is a larger number of widely experienced career men in the Postal Service than there has ever been before. Each was selected because of his integrity, his ability, and his long experience in the civil service. We have a well-organized business unit, manned by loyal and efficient officers and employees who are interested in providing the best mail serv-and employees who are interested in providing the best mail service of any country in the world.

In this connection I wish to pay tribute to the vast army of postal employees, men and women, who have so loyally cooperated with me in the work of the Post Office Department. In the course of my duties I have visited many post offices in various parts of the country, and wherever I have gone I have received the most generous welcome and hospitality from the thousands of employees I have met. I want them to know how deeply I appreciate their fine spirit of service, and long after I have left the Department I shall cherish the memories of this fine body of postal workers in the whole-hearted assistance they extended to me during my tenure of office. ing my tenure of office.

conclusion, I congratulate the people of Sarasota on this splendid new structure. It will add greatly to the beauty of your city, and I trust it will promote the convenience of all your citizens and aid them in their business enterprises.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE FEDERAL HOUSING ACT NOT SUCCESSFUL TO DATE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the bill I introduced today to amend the National Housing Act, and to include also a communication from the Cleveland Federation of Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege 1 year ago, during the session of the Seventy-third Congress, to lead a delegation of the Members of the House of Representatives to the White House to confer with the Chief Executive, in an effort to enlist the support of the administration in legislation creating a national housing act.

The delegation comprised Republicans, Democrats, and Farmer-Laborites, representing a cross section of the industrial districts of the country. It was the consensus of opinion of the delegation, and expressed to the President of the United States, that there was an urgent need for legislation to provide funds for renovizing, repairing, and modernizing of homes, and a strong demand for the construction of new homes.

At that time there were hundreds of thousands of skilled mechanics unemployed in the Nation. I mentioned to the President that in Cleveland there were approximately 60,000 members of the building trades idle for 3 or more years, and we anticipated that through this legislation the unemployment jam could be broken, and many thousands of the unemployed would be absorbed in gainful occupation.

The President of the United States gave respectful hearing to the appeal of this delegation and expressed his sympathy and desire that such legislation be enacted. It was significant that shortly thereafter the National Emergency Council created the machinery that resulted in what is now known as the "National Housing Act."

The opposition to this proposed legislation was freely expressed in debates when the act was before the House for consideration. The opposition came chiefly from the building-and-loan institutions of the country, which institutions had collapsed entirely in a large part, and were not in a position to loan for the purpose indicated by the then pending legislation.

Since the creation of this legislation no material benefits have come to the building-trades craft of the country for whom the act was primarily designed to benefit. On the contrary the financial institutions, who qualify under the act, are not making loans for new construction. Too much New York Life Insurance Co. and other similar institutions attention is paid to the administration of title I, and large amounts of money are being spent to advertise the products of certain capital-goods industries.

While some financial results have been obtained through the administration of title I, to wit, the repairing and modernizing of homes, and in the installation of refrigeration plants, and so forth, greater good could be obtained by paying more attention to the administration of title II. and providing funds for new construction. It is apparent that the banks and financial institutions will not respond in making loans for new construction in the fashion anticipated by the proponents of the National Housing Act. Unless the Government comes to the rescue by making loans direct to individuals for construction purposes, we can reasonably expect no material benefits resulting from the administration of title II under the present set-up.

In an effort to secure action that would be beneficial to the prospective home owners and give employment to the building-trades craftsmen, I have introduced H. R. 6239, which is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I respectfully submit that this measure, although it only allocated $500,000,000 for direct loans for new construction, it is a step in the right direction and will force the financial institutions who qualify under the act to be more liberal and more responsive to the applicants for loans for new construction, when they will be in direct competition with the Federal Government. I insert the bill referred to, H. R. 6239:

A bill to amend title II of the National Housing Act, to authorize home-mortgage loans, and to appropriate the sum of $500,000,000 therefor, and for other purpose

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (2) of paragraph (b) of section 203 of the National Housing Act be amended to read as follows:

"(2) Involve a principal obligation (including such initial service charges and appraisal and other fees as the Administrator shall approve) in an amount not to exceed $16,000, and not to exceed 80 percent of the appraised value of the property as of the date the mortgage is insured."

SEC. 2. That the following sections be added to title II of said

"SEC. 210. The Administrator is further authorized and empow ered to make loans for the construction of dwellings as defined in section 201 of this title upon the security of mortgages as defined in said section 201, which mortgages are either insured or for which commitments for the insuring thereof have been made as in said section provided.

"SEC. 211. The Administrator is further authorized to purchase or to agree to purchase from any mortgagee approved by the Administrator under the provisions of paragraph (b) of section 201 hereof, any mortgage, together with the credit instruments, if any, secured thereby which is insured under the provisions of this title, and covers property or low-cost housing projects constructed after the passage of this act.

"SEC. 212. Such loans shall be made and the purchase or the agreement to purchase such mortgages shall be made at such rates and under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribe, and all agreements to purchase such mortgages shall be completed prior to December 31, 1938.

"Sec. 213. The amount of the loans which the Administrator may make under section 210 hereof and the amount of the mortgages which he may purchase under section 211 hereof shall not exceed in the aggregate $500,000,000 and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make available to the Administrator said sum of $500,000,000 or such part thereof as he may from the time deem processary and the amount of potes dehentures. said sum of $500,000 of such part thereof as he may from time to time deem necessary, and the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to provide existing law is hereby increased by an amount sunicient to provide such funds: Provided, That the President, in his discretion, is authorized to provide such funds or any portion thereof by allotment to the Administrator from any funds that are available, or may hereafter be made available, to the President for emergency

The recent amendment I presented to the R. F. C. Act, and which was adopted by the House, provides for assistance in the creation of national mortgage associations by giving opportunity to secure funds from the R. F. C. for initial capital investment and undoubtedly will pave the way to activity in the mortgage market by permitting these associations to buy and sell mortgages created as a result of the administration of this act.

I respectfully submit that despite the statement of the Chairman of the Federal Housing Administration that the are now ready to loan for new construction at low interest rates an amortized plan of long-term credit will not solve the problem, as in many communities institutions of this type will not loan for new construction where they have many real properties on their hands, and upon which they are inevitably bound to sustain a substantial loss.

I respectfully submit for the consideration of the House and the Nation communication forwarded to me under date of February 18, 1935, over the signature of Mr. Dan Moley, secretary of the Cleveland Federation of Labor. Through unanimous consent I have the privilege to insert this communication in the RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

> CLEVELAND FEDERATION OF LABOR, Cleveland, Ohio, February 18, 1935.

Hon. Martin L. Sweeney,
Member of Congress, House Office Building,

Washington, D. C.
DEAR CONGRESSMAN SWEENEY: Enclosed herewith is a propo DEAR CONGRESSMAN SWEEDLY: Enclosed herewith is a proposed bill to amend the National Housing Act. The amendment to the R. F. C. bill which you introduced was a very important forward step in that it authorized the R. F. C. to subscribe for or make loans upon the stock of the national mortgage associations. However, we have no assurance as to how much of the $100,000,000 will go into the national mortgage associations. This R. F. C. amendment is not a substitution for the amendment contained in the proposed bill.

Under the amendment which we are proposing to the Housing Act the Administrator is authorized to make loans for the con-struction of dwellings upon the security of mortgages which are insured under the Housing Act, or to purchase construction mort-gages insured under the Housing Act. This is a clear, definite, distinct, and direct way to attack the present problem. We need new construction and we need it badly. The men in the building industry are out of work and hundreds of thousands of owners want to build, and the only way that the desire of those who want to build can be utilized to put the unemployed to work is through construction loans. Such loans are not available in most localities.

The Federal Housing Administration argues that it is necessary to amend the State banking laws in many of the States regardless of the fact that the national banks are now enabled to make loans and are so liquid that they do not know what to do with their funds. If this be true, then it is up to the Government to make loans until such a time as these banks are put in a position to make loans.

It is also stated that the moratorium laws in certain Sta whereby foreclosures are postponed, are another stumbling block to the lending institutions. If that be true, that is another argument for the making of direct loans by the Government. The building industry and the large number of employees depending upon it cannot wait longer, regardless of what arguments or excuses are made.

Under provisions of the amendment to the R. F. C. Act, in order that construction loans may become available it must subscribe for stock in or make loans upon stock of national mortgage associations or other financial institutions. I do not believe that the existing financial institutions will avail themselves of this opportunity to obtain funds. Similar opportunities have been open for many months past for such institutions to borrow money through the Federal home-loan bank or to obtain additional funds by conversion into Federal savings-and-loan associations. Existing institutions do not care to sell stock or borrow money for the pur-stitutions do not care to sell stock or borrow money for the purpose of stimulating new construction.

It is true that some relief might come through the formation of national mortgage associations, though the failure of such organizations to be created in the 9 months since the Housing Act was enacted argues that there will be few, if any, created in the future. There is evidently something wrong with the set-up of the national mortgage associations or such organizations would already be functioning.

The very existence of funds to lend in the hands of the Housing Administrator would stir the existing agencies having money to lend to come into the mortgage field. As long as no other mortgage companies are making loans, the existing agencies are willing to withhold their funds, believing—though erroneously—that delay in new construction will better enable them to dispose of the properties they have acquired.

There is no better acquirety for the investment of funds today.

There is no better security for the investment of funds today than a well-secured and insured mortgage on new real estate. You can rest assured that if existing institutions with money to lend see these mortgages being taken up by someone else they will come into the field and furnish the necessary funds.

I suggest there be a caucus held by the Ohio delegation for the purpose of organizing to gather all the strength possible to have these amendments adopted, and, further, that this Ohio delegation draw in their colleagues from the other States and form a congressional delegation to present to President Roosevelt the true situation. I am firmly convinced that he does not know that one of the measures which he described to the strength of the measures which he described to the strength of the measures which he described to the strength of the measures which he described to the strength of the measures which he described to the strength of the measures which he described to the strength of the str of the measures which he depends upon to relieve unemployment and stimulate business has not been administered to the best interests of those for whom it was created. Any resolutions that the industry or their labor might present will not be effective because, in the first place, the President does not have time to read such resolutions and, in the second place, because they are oftentimes routed through to the administrative official whom they are criticizing. We know from our experience in the past that it was only when a congressional delegation called upon the President personally that definite action was taken.

It seems to me that, as Ohio is second only to Pennsylvania in the employment of men in the manufacture and distribution of building materials, every Ohio legislator should make this the first order of business. We know from past experience that there are several hundred Congressmen throughout the country who realize that something must be done, and you should experience no difficulty in having them accompany you to see the President.

Kiplinger, in his last article in the current issue of Nation's Business magazine, states that Congress will probably put fire under the Federal Housing Administration. I understand that the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association are meeting in Washington for the purpose of putting out a Nation-wide protest.

It does seem to us that if the administration is serious about this matter every necessary thing will be done rather than have criticism come from business men and the unemployed first and then do something later.

I am addressing this letter to you because you were instrumental in forming the last delegation to the President, but I have also written Senators Bulkley and Donahey and the other Congressmen from this district this same letter.

men from this district this same letter.

Although the National Housing Act was passed as an emergency measure to put men to work, it is perfectly obvious to everyone that unemployment has not been relieved to any great exent, and it is perfectly true that there has not been enough new construction started to even talk about it. The real reason is the desire on the part of the lending institutions to sell the properties on their hands before they allow any new construction. This whole argument was threshed out pro and con during the session of the Seventy-third Congress. Unless something is done to stimulate new construction, building-trades men will be out of work for the rest of this year; and if something is not done by the Congress, it means they will face another winter without work.

There is plenty of demand throughout the country for homes.

gress, it means they will face another winter without work.

There is plenty of demand throughout the country for homes, but the financing is not available and will not be unless the banks know that the Government is in a position to make direct loans. If this Federal Housing Administration does not fulfill the promises held out by President Roosevelt you can look for a tremendous backlash during the 1936 campaign. This National Housing Act can be the foundation for recovery and one of the best arguments for a continuance in power of the Democratic Party, but if it is not carried out properly and if construction is not started it will be a boomerang that will be hard to catch.

The great mass of people know little about the goldstandard.

be a boomerang that will be hard to catch.

The great mass of people know little about the gold-standard argument, the World Court, a big Navy, or many other such issues; but this National Housing Act has had so much publicity and advertising that the citizens of every little hamlet in the country have looked forward with hope to better business country his through it.

I know from my own experience that the citizens of Ohio are getting sick and tired of promises of what the National Housing Act is going to do for them, and in the various meetings that we held there was a strained atmosphere and the people were in a critical mood. It is my opinion that the legislator who plays a prominent part in seeing that this law is put into operation properly or is the proponent of amendments which will make it more effective will have something substantial to talk about to the greatest number of people. The entire building industry, including labor, will forever be grateful. It seems to me an opportunity too wonderful for our Ohio legislators to miss, and I trust that they will take these amendments and jam them through this Congress as quickly as they can, as well as take every other step necessary to put us in a position to carry out the purposes of the National Housing Act.

I should like to have an expression of your views on this mat-

I should like to have an expression of your views on this matter as soon as possible, because the situation in Ohio is serious. Suggest that this letter or parts thereof be read on the floor of Congress and introduced into the RECORD.

Very truly yours,

DAN MOLEY Secretary, the Cleveland Federation of Labor.

Mr. Speaker, again I repeat the prime objective of the National Housing Act was to absorb the unemployed skilled laborers and mechanics, and to meet the demand for the construction of new homes, which demand is apparent to those who care to seriously study the question. This season of the year in normal times generally expands into activity, especially in the building lines. Every advantage should be taken of the opportunity afforded by those in charge of the administration of the National Housing Act to carry out the expressed intent of Congress, especially the administration of title II and to pay less attention to the campaign being conducted for the purpose of publicizing the household appliances manufactured and sold by the General Motors Co., the Johns-Manville Co., the General Electric Co., and one or two others who have a monopoly on the production of these special appliances.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including an address I made last evening to the "Little Congress."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address I made last evening to the "Little Congress", as follows:

I am glad for this opportunity to address you. This assemblage is quite famously known throughout the length and breadth of

I am glad for this opportunity to address you. This assemblage is quite famously known throughout the length and breadth of the land. References to your proceedings are not infrequently noted in the local press of America. I take it that most of you, if not all of you, are ambitious as you become qualified by age and experience to take a larger part in the political affairs of this country. If it were within the compass of my capabilities to help you in furthering your ambitions, I should feel that I have done, not only for you but for the country, a real service.

What is it basically that has caused the perplexities of the past, the present, and is surely to engage the future, or, in other words, what is the issue that we have grappled with in the past, ensnared the present, and will become paramount in the future?

It is the question of price levels. If the capitalistic system is to survive, if the country and the world is to avoid chaos, we must treat price levels. This is the great problem of statesmanship of our day, and will be in your day and a long time thereafter. Time does not permit of reference to the past nor to the future, and only to the present in a limited way.

What was the basic, fundamental thing that brought on the Roosevelt administration? It was not reform, although that helped; it was not work or direct relief, because that came afterward; but it was the confidence of the people that price levels of the products of our farms, our mines, and our forests would be raised to that point where the average man engaged in such pursuits, with average energy, ability, and facility, could make the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. And that means a rather high price level if we are going to pay our public and private debt, cope with high taxes, and furnish the standard of living that Americans are accustomed to.

Now, I do not care how successful this administration may be in its efforts for reform—and I am for that within reason—or how

Now, I do not care how successful this administration may be in Now, I do not care how successful this administration may be in its efforts for reform—and I am for that within reason—or how generous and just it may be to the recipients of relief, and how equitable it may be to the taxpayers who will eventually pay the bill, or what public improvements and conveniences it may set up, or what credits it may extend to anyone, it will fall and go out of power unless it is successful either by design or chance or, rather, may I say, luck, to bring about the price level for prime commodities that I have already alluded to.

modities that I have already alluded to.

To state the matter concretely, in 1929 the value of the new wealth taken from the ground, so to speak, was $20,000,000,000, equivalent to 5 percent on our then existing national-wealth structure of $400,000,000,000. In 1932 this new wealth had a money value of about $8,000,000,000, hardly able to sustain a wealth structure of $200,000,000,000. This sum hardly supports our debts in this country. So, taken as a whole, this Nation was at that time bankrupt. It is a little better now, but still has a long way to go.

Now, I have said nothing about labor, industrial, financial, and commercial enterprise. I need not say anything about these, because, if you solve the problem of the price level for the producers cause, if you solve the problem of the price level for the producers of prime commodities, these other things will take care of themselves and do it handsomely. I do not mean to say that these things will not have problems, and the people have problems with reference to them. The intricate social relationships of these days will require legislatively some checks and balances with reference to these things. What I mean to say is that the unemployment will cease to vex us, labor will have high wages, productive industry reasonable profits, and capital will secure its just reward.

I refuse to accept as a permanent policy and look about it with misgivings even as temporary the policy of production control of prime commodities. The problem of statesmanship is to take care of 40,000,000 unemployed men in the world by putting them to work at remunerative tasks. Restore the value of prime commodities, or, to state it in another way, restore price levels, and 40,000,000 men will go back to work and pay for consuming those commodities. As has been said many times, overproduction is not the problem, but underconsumption due to lack of purchasing power.

Cutting down production by Government action will not generate lem, but underconsumption due to lack of purchasing power.

Cutting down production by Government action will not generate purchasing power in the long run. We shall come to realize such actions to be a delusion. Let the grinding force of economic law regulate it. If your ambition is to be statesmen worthy of the name, my advice to you is not to monkey too much with economic law. It is a buzz saw. There is a field for statesmanship to which I want to particularly call your attention, and that is social insurance, and by that I mean old age, unemployment, blind, infant, mothers, and so forth mothers, and so forth.

The nations have made some progress and there is a heap more to be accomplished, but do not get the cart before the horse and use these things to get yourselves out of depressions. It just can't be done. What you want to do is to treat price levels as I said, for during a period of depression these things tend to depress price levels, and that makes more depression—for what is depression but depressed price levels? Cure your price levels and producers of wealth will gladly kick in to support reasonable social insurance plans; and they should. What they are kicking about now is paying while operating in the red. Give them some black ink and then make them pay, and they will rise up and call you blessed.

Now, I know you are saying to yourself this all sounds good but it is strange and queer. I'll admit that common sense does sound strange and queer in these days, but I am talking to statesmen of the future.

men of the future.

Prosperity, with rare exceptions, always has been and always will be a vital issue. Proper price levels, not artificially engendered, mean prosperity; low price levels mean depression.

You naturally inquire of yourself: Well, how can I operate on the prosperity end and not on the depression end of this thing? The one means in power and the other means out of power. Out of power is the purgatory of a statesman's life. Everybody hates purgatory. I cannot tell you exactly how to get on the prosperity end and stay on it. I can, however, give you some things to think about. In my judgment, the key to prosperity price levels is to regulate the value of purchasing power of gold. The money of the world is gold, claims on gold, and gold equivalents. Wheat, cotton, copper, rubber, sugar, coffee, and whatnot are measured in terms of the value of gold. Gold itself is a commodity, and its value is subject to the law of supply and demand. It is a supreme commodity that measures all other commodities.

Gold, though its price be fixed, fluctuates nevertheless in value or purchasing power. This fluctuation engenders two movements with reference to price levels.

with reference to price levels.

As gold expands in purchasing power, currency and bank deposits, which are claims on gold, lose velocity, because buyers withhold commitments, feeling they will get more for their money, hence lower price levels. The other movement is, as gold contracts in purchasing power, currency and bank deposits gain velocity, because buyers want to invest for profit in the various forms of property—result, higher price levels. To apply the language of the stock market, one is a long and the other a short operation.

I do not say that the claims on gold in the form of currency or bank credits have not an influence on price levels. They do, but not in the interests of higher price levels, when gold is expanding in purchasing power, or while people think it will expand panding in purchasing power, or while people think it will expand in purchasing power.

When gold is expanding in purchasing power or people think it will, they hoard it and claims upon-it. Then, even though you have plenty of currency for all normal purposes, you will have the phenomena of the people complaining that there is not enough money in circulation, most people broke, depression price levels; and the way to cure this condition is to start the printing presses going or adopt some "damphool" idea with reference to silver with the idea of artificially raising price levels. This is infinitely. inflation.

Of course, inflation can come another way when the Government gets so heavily in debt that confidence diminishes in its ability to eventually pay its obligations in gold. But I must not get off the track about inflation. That's worse than purgatory—that's hell. Before I got off the track I wanted to say that by your statesmanship you must regulate the value of gold in the interests of prosperity price levels. When your price levels restain point snip you must regulate the value of gold in the interests of prosperity price levels. When your price levels reach a certain point consistent with equity to debtor and creditor alike, tax obligations and reasonable profit to producers of prime commodities, then you must stop and stabilize, and then your aim must be to keep your money of constant purchasing power from generation to generation. That is the ideal of statesmanship.

to generation. That is the ideal of statesmanship.

I offered a bill in the Seventy-second Congress and again in the Seventy-third, H. R. 1577, designed to accomplish these results. In short, it recognized a corner on gold, a hoarding of gold and claims on gold; and, in order to break the corner, the bill provided that silver be given legal-tender qualities for its world-accepted value. This bill recognizes gold as the single standard of measurement, but uses silver in limited amounts in competition with gold to reduce gold to a normal purchasing power and then stabilize it, thus making it the servant rather than the master of mankind master of mankind.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. ZgBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of mercies, in whom are the springs of all parental grace: we thank Thee for the spirit that breathes upon this earth of ours with patience, kindly care, and gracious works, wherein Thou dost reveal Thy loving-kindness in the morning and Thy faithfulness every night. Above all, we bless Thee for the precious human things of life: for the hearts that love and trust us, for the teaching of sorrow, for the ministry and use of pain, and for the healing touch of time, bringing to us wider thoughts and an ever-growing sympathy for all who are oppressed with wrong. Do Thou guard and garrison the hearts of all Thy people with the inestimable gift of peace, and enable us to accept, without repining, the discipline of the present time as the means whereby we may press forward to the goal of a high and holy influence among the nations of the world. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord and Savior. Amen.

WILLIAM P. M'CRACKEN, JR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Sergeant at Arms has a report to submit to the Senate, which will now be received.

The Sergeant at Arms, Chesley W. Jurney, submitted the following report:

> SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS. Washington, D. C., February 28, 1935.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

The case of Chesley W. Jurney, petitioner, v. William P. Mac-Cracken, Jr., having been decided in favor of the petitioner by the Supreme Court of the United States, the said William P. Mac-Cracken, Jr., pursuant to a stipulation entered into on February Cracken, Jr., pursuant to a stipulation entered into on February 15, 1934, by and between the said William P. MacCracken, Jr., and myself, as Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, submitted himself to me on February 26, 1935, for commitment to the District of Columbia Jail for the period of 10 days prescribed in Senate Resolution 185, agreed to on February 14, 1934. I thereupon, at 4 p. m. on said day, committed him to the duly constituted authorities of said jail, and their receipt is hereto attached.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Office of the Sergeant at Arms, Washington, D. C., February 26, 1935.

To the duly constituted authorities in charge of the District of Columbia Jail:

Sins: In accordance with the order of the United States Senate adopted Wednesday, February 14, 1934 (legislative day of Tuesday, Feb. 6, 1934), a copy of which is hereto attached, I now deliver to your institution for confinement therein for the term set forth in the order of the Senate heretofore referred to, William P. Mac-Cracken, Jr., and ask that a copy of this letter be signed by you as my receipt for the delivery and confinement of the said person in confinement. in your institution.

Respectfully.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY. Sergeant at Arms United States Senate. Received the above person at 4 p. m., February 26, 1935.

THOMAS M. RIVES,

Superintendent District of Columbia Jail.

By E. G. TURNURE,

Receiving Officer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, succeeding the report by the Sergeant at Arms, a statement by William P. MacCracken, Jr., made February 26, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Black] whether he has seen the statement?

Mr. BLACK. I assume it is the same statement that was in the press. If it is, I have seen it.

Mr. NORRIS. I also saw that statement, and I doubt very much whether it recites the facts as they are. I do not believe that the Senate ought to permit to be printed in the RECORD a statement by the defendant in the case which is contrary to the facts as established in the Senate. I realize that the Senator from Alabama had charge of the matter, and I do not wish to interfere, if he has seen the statement, but if it is the same statement I saw, I do not think it states the truth.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the statement, but it has long been the practice, and a fair one, that when anyone has offered to make a statement to permit it to go into the RECORD for what it is worth. Inasmuch as the statement has been presented here today, I think it quite proper that it should go into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. If the statement I saw in the newspapers the State of Indiana to construct, maintain, and operate a is correct and is the same as that now being offered for the RECORD, there ought to be some sort of an apology offered by the Supreme Court of the United States for sustaining the action of the Senate, for if that statement be true, then, we have put in jail an innocent man who has committed no crime or done anything wrong. The statement is at complete variance with what the Senate found to be the facts and that the Supreme Court supported.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I will state that, while I have offered no objection to the presentation of the statement for the RECORD, I desire to be distinctly understood that I do not agree that the statement is correct. I do not concede its correctness by not objecting to its being placed in the RECORD. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] that certain inferences from the statement in part, in my judgment, at least, are contrary to the facts submitted to the committee and upon which the Senate sentenced Mr. MacCracken.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in view of statements which have been made about the matter I shall object, for the present at least, the inclusion of the statement in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. AUSTIN. I give notice that at an appropriate time I shall read the statement, and perhaps I shall have something to say about it.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chief examiner of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a schedule of papers on the files of the Commission in Washington, and in certain field offices, that are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. Bulow and Mr. WHITE members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

SAN FRANCISCO PEAKS TOLL ROAD, ARIZONA (S. DOC. NO. 25)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 234 of the Seventy-third Congress submitted by Mr. Ashurst, information relative to the purchase of a toll road in the Coconino National Forest, Ariz., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, ordered to be printed as a Senate document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Washington, February 26, 1935.

The PRESIDENT UNITED STATES SENATE.

SIR: Reference is made to Senate Resolution 234 of the Seventythird Congress requesting this Department to enter into negotiations with the San Francisco Mountain Scenic Boulevard Co. of Arizona for the purchase of the toll road to the summit of the San Francisco Peaks in the Coconino National Forest, State of Arizona.

During the past season the Department caused an examination to be made of the road in question by Mr. W. J. Ward, associate highway engineer of the Bureau of Public Roads of this Department, who, after making a detailed study of the road and other possible locations for a satisfactory highway to the summit of the San Francisco Peaks, reported, with respect to the existing road, as follows:

"The existing road to the top of the mountain is known as the San Francisco Mountain Boulevard or the Weatherford Road,

"The existing road to the top of the mountain is known as the San Francisco Mountain Boulevard or the Weatherford Road, after its promoter. This road was constructed with private funds under permits from the Secretary of Agriculture, the first of which was granted to J. W. Weatherford in 1916. A later permit granted to the San Francisco Mountain Scenic Boulevard Co. in 1920 stipulated that, on demand of the Secretary of Agriculture after 15 years from that date or at intervals of 5 years thereafter, the road should be surrendered to the Government upon payment of its reasonable physical value.

"Construction was begun about 1919 and completed in 1928. The company operated this road thereafter as a toll road until 1934, when they were unable to provide proper maintenance. It is the desire of the company that the Secretary of Agriculture exercise its right and take over the road, since it has not been a financial success. The company claims to have spent about financial success. The company claims to have spent about $150,000 on the road to date.

"This road begins at the toll house, 3.5 miles north of Flag-staff, on the Fort Valley Road, and extends to a point on top of the ridge between Agassiz and Humphrey Peaks, elevation about 12,000 feet, having a length of 15 miles. Standards of alinement and grade are very low, there being 10 switch-backs of about 25-foot radius and many more of somewhat larger radius. Grades foot radius and many more of somewhat larger radius. Grades are not uniform and range up to 18 percent, with very little suitable for high gear. Construction was done to a width of 12 to 15 feet, but lack of maintenance has reduced the effective width several feet at this time. It is very rough and barely passable from toll house to mile 10 at Fremont Saddle and entirely impassable beyond this point.

"U.S. highways nos. 66 and 89 pass through Flagstaff, population 3,900, which will be the source of San Francisco Mountain traffic. The Fort Valley Road extends from Flagstaff to Fort Valley via toll house, and the Hart Prairie and other minor roads continue entirely around the west and north sides of the mountain and join U.S. no. 89 near Deadman's Wash, northeast of the mountain. The Schultz Pass Road extends from the Fort Valley Road to toll house to Schultz Pass, then descends again north of Mount Eldon to U.S. no. 89. Flagstaff has built a low-standard road along their water conduit from Schultz Pass to the intake near Jack Smith Spring, from which point the Forest Service has built a narrow development road 4 miles in length around to a spring a narrow development road 4 miles in length around to a spring on the north side of Humphrey Peak. Other minor roads are shown on the map.

"The San Francisco Mountain Boulevard has been open for travel in normal years only about 90 days per year. This was largely due to the great difficulties encountered on the north side of Fremont Peak between Fremont Saddle and Doyles Saddle, where snow and ice collect on the north slope and where slides frequently occur.

"Since none of the existing toll road will be utilized on the recommended route, its value to the Government is limited to its recommended route, its value to the Government is limited to its value as a fire-patrol and forest-administration road and to its value to engineers and contractors during location and construction. This road is of some value to the Forest Service from a point 1 mile north of the toll house to Doyles Saddle, a distance of about 10 miles, since it traverses an area not served by existing roads or by the recommended route. The Forest Service estimates a similar road suitable to their purpose and to serve this area would cost $20,000 to $30,000 to construct.

"For a location survey this road would eliminate the necessity for a pack train for a period of about 2 months as well as save some time. The estimated value of the road for this purpose is $500.

some time. The estimated value of $500.

"Its value to contractors is rather intangible. With some improvement it would serve to make the recommended route accessible for equipment at Fremont Saddle and various places beyond that point. The contractor's method of operation is also a factor in valuing the present road for this purpose. It is believed $2,000 to $3,000 would be a fair value to contractors of this road."

The Forest Service reports that the present road is paralleled by an existing development road constructed by the Forest Service, which serves in a large measure the administrative needs of that which serves in a large measure the administrative needs of that Service. Furthermore, there are other forest-protection roads reaching the region from the north side of the mountain. Consequently the Forest Service does not feel justified in placing any appraised value on the toll road for the protection requirements of that Service.

Notwithstanding substantial expenditures made by the present owners of the toll road, it is the judgment of this Department that the road is totally inadequate for safe public use. It is unsurfaced and in large part consists of merely a single-track road of dangerously narrow width. The hazards of numerous switch-backs of as little as 25 percent radius of curvature and the chiestlengths which are not uniform in characteristics. switch-backs of as little as 25 percent radius of curvature and the objectionable nature of gradients which are not uniform in character and which range up to 18 percent are, of course, obvious. Only a small proportion of the traveling public would be willing to use or could safely use a road of such character even though maintenance work was performed. It is stated that at no time since the completion of the road have the revenues been sufficient to cover the cost of maintenance.

In view of the facts found, the Department does not feel that it will be warranted in entering into negotiations for the purchase it will be warranted in entering into negotiations for the purchase of this road at any price.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) R. G. TUGWELL, Acting Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Joint Memorial 5

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully repre-

Whereas the early and complete development of Tongue Point as a secondary naval base in accordance with the original understand-ing between the citizens of Clatsop County and the United States should be undertaken immediately; and Whereas the immediate establishment of one or more fully equipped flying fields in the State of Oregon to be maintained by adequate Army personnel should be undertaken by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the Federal Government has expended approximately $470,000,000 on the Pacific coast for military posts and naval shore establishments, and of that sum approximately $330,000,000 has been expended in the State of California and $136,000,000 in the State of Washington and only $5,000,000 in the State of Oregon, or less than 1 percent of the full amount expended by the Federal Government on the Pacific coast for national defense has been allocated to the State of Oregon; and Whereas there are at the present time some 80 active and inactive military and naval posts on the Pacific coast and Oregon's share only consists under the defense program of one military post at Fort Stevens, which is inactive, a radio station at Astoria, and the undeveloped secondary naval base at Tongue Point, Clatsop County;

Whereas the entrance to the Columbia River should be adequately protected by the best modern defensive military equipment used by the air, Army, and naval forces as a hostile force landing on the Pacific coast would have one of two main objectives:

To seize, occupy, and destroy important territory and restrict vital commerce in order to force a settlement of the dispute on terms favorable to the invader;

terms favorable to the invader;

2. To seize and occupy territory preliminary to annexation and colonization by the invading power; and

Whereas a survey of the Oregon coastline shows that in order to accomplish either of the above objectives the landing of hostile forces at any point other than the Columbia River would be ineffective unless the invaders were able to penetrate the coast range and occupy the valleys between the Cascade and coast ranges, and a hostile power able to occupy the territory adjacent to the Columbia River would restrict commerce at that point and enable them to send cruisers, destroyers, and troop transports up the Columbia and Willamette Rivers as far as Vancouver and Portland and enable them to establish a base for the conquest of the great wheat belt of eastern Oregon and Washington as well as the Willamette Valley; and

Whereas military authorities have reached the conclusion that in order to safely defend this area there should be established:

1. Fort Stevens:

(a) Three batteries railroad artillery. This has already been recommended to the War Department by the Coast Artillery, but no appropriation has been made for the transportation and installation of the same.

(b) One battalion Regular Army field artillery, 155-mm howitzer; detachment of antiaircraft artillery; at least 1 searchlight platoon; 1 gun battery and 1 machine-gun battery and a mine-laying detachment.

2. Flying fields:
Two first-class, fully equipped flying fields established by the Army Air Corps and maintained by Regular Army equipped personnel. One of the fields to be located in the vicinity of Portland and the other in central or southwestern Oregon, and each field should have the following permanent garrison detachment Air Corps: Detachment antiaircraft artillery, at least 1 searchlight platoon, 1 gun battery, and one machine-gun battery, and the fields to be maintained so that a large fleet of all types of airplanes could arrive at the field immediately prepared for action and utilize the field as a base of operations.

3. The Oregon National Guard Field Artillery 166-mm Howitzer

3. The Oregon National Guard Field Artillery 166-mm Howitzer Regiment should be completed by adding the headquarters and service units and two firing batteries.

The Oregon National Guard partial regiment of coast artillery harbor defense, consisting of five batteries, should be converted to antiaircraft artillery and additional units added to complete the regiment; and regiment; and

Whereas a grave emergency exists from the fact that we, the greatest creditor nation of the world, are envied by all nations, and that the only unprotected spot on our Pacific coastline is the State of Oregon, and in case of war with any foreign nation we would be the vulnerable point of attack: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to pass appropriate legislation to carry out the provisions embodied in this memorial; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each member of the Oregon delegation in Congress, and that the secretary of state is hereby instructed to transmit the same.

Senate Concurrent Resolution T

Be it enacted by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the house of representatives concurring):

Whereas a large percentage of the farmers of the State of North Dakota are experiencing a shortage of feed for their livestock because of crop fallure in the year 1934 by reason of the drought and have not the means with which to purchase sufficient grains for feeding purposes at their present high prices; and

Whereas farmers are receiving Federal aid for the purchasing of feed to sustain their livestock, but that the aid or relief provided is inadequate with which to purchase sufficient feed at present high prices, even though the Federal allowance has been increased about 50 percent, since feed has also appreciated in price in about the same proportion; and

Whereas a large number of livestock have perished and many more will perish unless relief can be had; and

Whereas large quantities of feed, consisting of oats, barley, and low grades of wheat fit for feeding purposes, are available in the Dominion of Canada at considerably lower prices than prevail here, and that the importation of feed grains would not in any way prove detrimental to the agriculture industry of this State or of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Twenty-fourth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, That we respectfully petition the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the Congress of the United States to permit limited quantities of feed grains to be shipped into the United States, duty free, and in sufficient amount to relieve the acute feed situation that now prevails, and thereby prevent large losses by starvation of livestock in this and adjoining States; be it further

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

Joint Resolution 1, Laws of 1935

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt measures directed against mob violence and lynching

Whereas in many sections of the United States crimes of violence are rapidly increasing both in numbers and in seriousness; and

and

Whereas such crimes strike at the very fundamentals of our constitutional rights and our system of democratic government, tending, if unchecked, to result in an absolute disregard for and defiance of duly constituted agencies charged with the protection of life and property, and with the proper enforcement of our criminal laws; and

Whereas a continual disregard of the taking of human life and the destruction of property by irresponsible individuals banded together under the influence of excitement to usurp the prerogatives of legal agencies devoted to the apprehension, prosecution, and punishment of criminals, can but encourage the rising tide and punishment of criminals, can but encourage the rising tide of violence; and

Whereas a stable government can only be maintained where the courts, operating under due process of law, shall be the only agency or power permitted to deprive any citizen of his constitutional rights to life and liberty; and
Whereas we firmly believe that this unfortunate situation can be best curtailed and eradicated through the power of our Federal Government: Therefore be it

Senate Concurrent Resolution 7

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski Memorial Day resolution now pending in Congress

Whereas a resolution providing for the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, is now pending in the present session of the United States Congress; and

Whereas the 11th day of October, 1779, is the date in American history of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savanfrom wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the slege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia, and other States of the Union through legislative enactment designated October 11 of each year as "General Pulaski's Memorial Day"; and
Whereas it is fitting that the recurring anniversary of this day be commemorated with suitable patriotic and public exercises in observance and commemorating the heroic death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War; and
Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has by legislative enactment designated October 11, 1921, October 11, legislative enactment designated October 11, 1921, October 11, 1931, October 11, 1932, and October 11, 1934, as "General Pulaski's Memorial Day" in the United States of America: Now, therefore, be it

N. R. A. PRICE FIXING AND PRODUCTION CONTROL

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to present an important memorial with a brief word of explanation in connection with it.

There was organized yesterday in Washington a preliminary national committee for the elimination of price fixing and production control from N. R. A. codes in the future. It is a committee representing some of the finest industrial thought of the country. It reflects also the viewpoint of much consumer thinking, which believes that legalized monopoly is strangling the country. It is the committee which is undertaking to challenge the attitude of the National Manufacturers Association and the United States Chamber of Commerce insofar as these great organizations have advocated that the N. R. A. shall be continued practically in its existing form, when the existing law expires next June.

I ask that a very brief statement of the principles adopted by the committee and representative of the basic philosophy which always heretofore has saved America may be read by the clerk at the desk. It goes to the heart of the N. R. A.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR THE ELIMINATION OF PRICE FIXING AND PRODUCTION CONTROL-ADOPTED FEBRUARY 27, 1935

We affirm that the monopolistic power of price fixing and production control proffered to industry under N. R. A. is traditionally and economically unsound and dangerous. This is not only doing an injustice to the consumer, but is actually retarding

High costs and prices produced by such means lead to decreased volume of business and employment. Lower costs and lower prices which come from free competition will increase both volume and employment employment.

Trade-practice provisions designed to accomplish price fixing or production control must inevitably lead to regimentation of business and to the sacrifice of efficiency at the cost of the consumer.

Price-control power in the hands of industry today is working a great hardship upon many small industries.

We, therefore, insist that it is in the interest of recovery that there be incorporated in whatsoever legislation there may be to modify or continue the present National Industrial Recovery Act an affirmative prohibition against direct or indirect price fixing or production control.

If in the interest of the public welfare there is needed any additional legislation governing trade practices, let it be general in character and applied alike to all types of industry.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I associate myself with this sound general philosophy. I wish to indicate further that it is the announced purpose of the committee, according to its own statement, to undertake the mobilization of proof that both big and little industry in the United States subscribes in an overwhelming degree to this declaration of principle and to this demand for the restoration of free competition in respect to prices and production.

I want the RECORD to show the preliminary membership of the committee which issues this statement and which now proposes to contact 100,000 American industrialists. It is headed by Mr. Robert W. Irwin, president of the Robert W. Irwin Co., of Grand Rapids, Mich., who is chairman of the code authority, furniture manufacturing industry, and also a member of the durable goods industries committee. ask that the complete membership of the committee may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. VANDENBERG. In conclusion, I ask that a statement by Mr. Irwin may also be printed in the RECORD. It is a statement dealing with the proposed substitution of a socalled "open-price plan" for the existing N. R. A. price-fixing

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PURPOSE AND EFFECT OF THE "OPEN-PRICE PLAN" (OR PUBLICITY OF PRICES)

(By Robert W. Irwin, president Robert W. Irwin Co., Grand Rapids, Mich., chairman code authority furniture manufacturing industry)

Many lines of industry have, through the powers granted under N. R. A., adopted this very effective plan as a means of price fixing or price control.

Under this plan, if adopted by an industry and incorporated in its code, every unit in that industry is compelled to publicly file prices on all of its products. Prices are usually filed with the industry's code authority, and are available to all members of that

The person or concern is at liberty to change prices at will, but the time in which new prices may be made effective varies from immediately to a period of several days. The object of the waiting period, before goods may be sold at changed prices, is that all members of that industry may be advised of the change and thereby have an opportunity to better meet the competition brought about as a result of these changes.

Index the plan no manufacturer may sall his product at prices.

Under the plan no manufacturer may sell his product at prices or terms under other than those on file with whatever agency is designated for this purpose. To do so would be a violation of the law, and such an act would carry the penalties provided in the law, and such as N. R. A. statute.

Its proponents claim that its purpose is not price fixing, but rather to stabilize competition and to raise the ethical standards of business. It is supposed to prevent so-called "cutthroat, cannibalistic, ruthless competition." These are new phrases coined by those who no longer want to do business under the principles of free and open competition, but, on the other hand, want and are obtaining Government support to violate every principle of commerce which was safeguarded under the Sherman Antitrust Law. Its proponents very softly and smoothly say that all that is asked is that every buyer have an opportunity to purchase at the

Those who further the open-price policy are attempting to justify Those who further the open-price policy are attempting to justify their position by the argument that the clear marking of prices in the retail trades has helped business ethics tremendously, and that the open-price policy will result in similar benefits by clearly designating the prices at which a manufacturer proposes to sell his goods. This, it is argued, will eliminate many of the unfair trade practices, and therefore justifies the inclusion of this provision in N. R. A. and in codes.

vision in N. R. A. and in codes.

This contention is a pure delusion. There is, of course, no objection to the issuance of catalogs and price lists by business. In fact, in most businesses it is essential that catalogs and price lists be issued. There is no other way of doing business. It is quite another matter, however, to permit the issuance of these catalogs and price lists for interchange with competitors, and then hold the umbrella of law over this practice. In other words, when the Sherman antitrust and other laws are suspended and this practice affirmatively permitted the Sherman Antitrust Law, then obviously the open-price policy will flourish as a means and method of price fixing and price control. It is one thing for individual concerns to issue a price list. It is another thing to have a system under which an organized method of interchange of these price lists takes place with time lags for changes, etc., and with the consent of the Government and the waiver of the antitrust laws.

It sounds idealistic to one not familiar with the principles of

It sounds idealistic to one not familiar with the principles of trade, and the absolute necessity of a continuation of barter which has always been the underlying basis of the exchange in commodities.

Its purpose is not idealistic or in the public interest. Its purpose and effect are to control prices.

It forms and many times is used as an underlying base for a price-fixing agreement. It makes violators of one law of those who do not violate the Sherman Antitrust Law.

As an illustration of how this plan works in fixing prices if there is a secret and unrecorded agreement between manufacturers in a certain line:

After having reached the agreement in regard to prices, A, generally the largest concern, will issue the first price list. B, C, D, and others will follow suit. Everything is now set and prices have become stabilized. There can no longer be ruthless, cannibalistic, cutthroat, or cave-man competition, at least not so long as the understanding or agreement continues.

The first man who violates this agreement without notifying all of his competitors has violated a Federal law and is subject to punishment, notwithstanding the fact that by violating one law he is no longer continuing to violate the Sherman Antitrust Law.

The facts are that if the "open-price" plan is honestly adhered to it will greatly intenstify competition. What greater factor is there to intensify competition than to always know your competitor's prices? The fact that this is so well known in trade establishes beyond a question of doubt that the purpose of the "open-price" plan is nothing more or less than to bring about price stabilization, another name for price fixing. Even its adherents will admit that this is its purpose, but, as stated before, it does not accomplish that purpose unless there is an underlying agreement, which formerly was prohibited under the Sherman Antitrust Law.

If price fixing is to be taboard and the principles of tree and open.

If price fixing is to be tabooed and the principles of free and open competition are to be reestablished, with the Sherman Antitrust Law fully operative, it will be necessary that there be incorporated in any new N. R. A. act not only an affirmative prohibition against price fixing, but also a prohibition which will deny to any branch of industry operating under codes of so-called "fair competition" the right to make mandatory upon all members of that industry the public filing of prices. If the adoption and use of the "open-price" plan is to be permitted at all, it should be allowed only as an individual unit's right and not be made mandatory upon all operating within a given industry.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. GIBSON presented resolutions adopted by the Vermont Dairymen's Association, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Canada for the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway will be brought before the United States Senate at this session of

Whereas the development of the electrical power now going to waste on the St. Lawrence River would result in a lower rate and an increased use of electricity on the farms of Vermont; and

Whereas the lowering of rates for electricity would undoubtedly attract many new manufacturers to this State and thereby create increased employment and a corresponding increase in the demand for farm products; and

Whereas the improvement of navigation on the St. Lawrence River, covered by this treaty, will complete developments from the sea to the head of Lake Superior and is the first step in securing an outlet from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence River, for deep-draft steamships; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence Seaway will materially lower freight rates on all commodities and help to maintain a balance between agriculture and industry in Vermont: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Vermont Dairymen's Association respectfully petition United States Senator Ausrin and United States Senator Gibson to vote in favor of ratification of this treaty; and be it Resolved, That the Vermont Dairymen's Association instruct the secretary of this association to forward a copy of this reso-lution to the President of the United States, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX

Mr. ROBINSON. I present a communication from the director of the National Automobile Dealers Association, with accompanying resolutions, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the communication, with accompanying resolutions, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PINE BLUFF, ARK., February 21, 1935.

Senator Joseph T. Robinson,

Senator Joseph T. Robinson,

Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Robinson: I have the honor, as a member of the board of directors of the National Automobile Dealers Association, to submit to you, with a request for your support, the attached resolution opposing any further extension or enactment of the existing Federal gasoline tax of 1 cent per gallon.

This resolution has received unanimous adoption by our national executive committee. Being the State director for Arkansas I am sending this to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress. Our association president, F. W. A. Vesper, likewise has transmitted it to the President of the United States as well as to the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the United States Senate.

This Federal gasoline tax will expire normally June 30 next. It should be allowed to die. It is highly discriminatory and harmful to the automotive industry in that it acts as a deterrent to the sale and use of motor vehicles—the trade that has taken the leadership in pointing the way to national recovery the last year through a stimulation of automobile sales. Should it not be encouraged to further advance in business, instead of being handicapped further?

This tax was not levied for the maintenance of good roads, but is just another special tax imposed upon motor-vehicle operators for general-fund purposes.

for general-fund purposes.

What started to be a temporary, emergency tax, already has cost motorists $62,839,826.70 during the 6 months it was in effect in 1932, another $181,125,987.62 in 1933, and $170,000,000 (estimated) in 1934. The total special additional taxes paid by our unfairly burdened group is more than $1,000,000,000 per year, which was more than one-eighth of the total tax revenue collected for the Federal Government throughout the entire United States in 1934. (This was in addition to the other taxation to which motorvehicle owners and dealers paid.)

Despite the struggle of the automotive industry and the dealers' trade in 1934 to increase business, increase production, and increase employment, collections from automotive taxes by the Federal Government in 1934 was 2.1 percent greater than in 1933, according to the National Highway Users Conference.

Taxation on gasoline now totals from 20 to 100 percent of its retail price.

retail price.

Therefore, it is with confidence in your principles of fair treatment of all citizens alike that I present this resolution to you, expressing as it does the united feeling of our 30,000 dealers and the 25,000,000 car owners who should not be singled out from our population of 122,000,000 people to bear more than one-eighth additional share of the general expense of the Federal Government. Respectfully yours, FELIX G. SMART, Director, National Automobile Dealers Association.

Resolution on the Federal gasoline tax

To all United States Senators and Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has levied an emer-

Whereas the Congress of the United States has levied an emergency Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon on sales of gasoline, the revenues from which are utilized for general-fund purposes; and Whereas such Federal gasoline tax constitutes a double assessment on motor-vehicle operators, in view of the fact that the 48 States of the United States had already levied State taxes on sales of gasoline when the said Federal gasoline tax was imposed, and such tax is, in fact, an invasion of the rights of the States; and Whereas the use for general-fund purposes, of the said revenues derived from such Federal gasoline tax, constitutes, in effect, a usurpation and diversion of funds that should rightfully accrue to the States for road construction and maintenance; and the States for road construction and maintenance; and Whereas the assessment of this tax by the Federal Government is highly detrimental to the interests of the States, in that it now tends to make the total gasoline tax in many States prohibitive and is causing in some States diminished returns; and Whereas contrary to the intent and purpose of the gasoline-tax principle as originally recognized by the States and later subscribed to by the Congress of the United States in the HaydenCartwright Act of 1934, the Federal gasoline tax also encourages diversion and evasion of gasoline taxes in the States; and Whereas revenues from the taxation of gasoline sales were intended properly to belong to the States, for the construction and maintenance of roads and must be restored to them, particularly in view of the necessity for matching future Federal-aid funds, as soon to be provided under the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1934; and

as soon to be provided under the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1934; and

Whereas for the foregoing reasons, and in view of the fact that the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the Vinson Subcommittee on Double Taxation have each previously recognized the unfairness of the Federal gasoline tax and have stated that it ought to be eliminated; and

Whereas we believe that the said tax should be allowed to expire at the expiration of the present fiscal year, on June 30, 1935, and the taxation of gasoline hereafter left to the States for their exclusive use as a means of providing funds for highways: Now, therefore, be it therefore, be it therefore, be it Resolved, By the executive committee of the National Automobile Dealers' Association, by mail vote of January 24, 1935, pursuant to the constitution and bylaws of said association, whose membership during the year 1934 totaled 30,000 automobile dealers who are constantly in contact with the 25,000,000 motor-vehicle owners of the United States, said executive committee thereby being in a position to interpret the will not only of the association membership but of the owners of motor vehicles, as well, that the above committees and both Houses of Congress be and hereby are memorialized on behalf of the members of this organization to allow the Federal gasoline tax to expire at the close of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1935, in accordance with the declared intent at the time it was passed; that it be not levied again in any way whatsoever, and that the Federal Government permanently withwhatsoever, and that the Federal Government permanently with-draw from the field of gasoline taxation and leave to the States exclusively the power and right to tax gasoline sales in the future; and, be it further and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives to be laid before the members of the committee, and to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance to be laid before the members of that committee, and, likewise, that the directors of this association be requested to present this resolution with a letter of transmittal, to both Senators from their respective States, and to the Members of the House of Representatives who represent the district under the jurisdiction of each of the directors of this association, urging them to use their utmost endeavors to carry out our desires as expressed in the letter and spirit of this resolution, and thus afford to our members and all those who operate motor vehicles or are consumers of gasoline, commercially or privately, the greatly needed relief which they demand from an excessive burden of discriminatory taxation due largely to the combined high tax on gasoline in State and Nation. Nation.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
F. W. A. VESPER, Chairman.
Certified to be a true copy of resolution adopted by above executive committee.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to reintroduce a joint resolution which I introduced a few days ago and have it referred to the Committee on Finance. It authorizes the President to readjust the debts owing to this Government by the governments of Europe, and to use the proceeds for the discharge of the adjusted-service certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and referred as indicated by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 71) to authorize the President to enter into agreements with foreign governments to readjust the obligations of such governments held by the United States and to secure payments on such readjusted obligations sufficient to pay the adjusted-service certificates now outstanding, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM-AMENDMENT

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the McCarran amendment in the form of an added provision, which I respectfully ask the clerk to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] proposes to amend the so-called "McCarran amendment" to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) making appropriations for relief purposes by inserting at the proper place the following:

Provided, however, That the President is hereby authorized to examine the facts and determine whether the payment of such prevailing wage in any locality is subversive of the maintenance or recovery of private industry or otherwise detrimental thereto; and in the event that the President finds that the payment of such prevailing wage is so subversive or detrimental and shall issue a proclamation so declaring, then within 10 days thereafter he shall be and is authorized to direct the payment of such scale of wages in such locality as he shall determine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am thoroughly convinced that every Member of this body always has been, is now, and will hereafter be in favor of raising the living standards of the workers and the toilers of America.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President-

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas. Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator that before he proceeds with his address the Senate have an opportunity to conclude morning business.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Very well. I yield the floor, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, until morning business shall have been concluded.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 5221) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act with respect to rice, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. Nye, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1468) for the relief of Charles Augustus Lathrop, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD AND DRUGS-AMENDMENT

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT—PROCESSING TAX ON RICE

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5221) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act with respect to rice, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on ! Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

MAGGIE THOMAS DAVIS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 90), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1934, to Maggie Thomas Davis, daughter of William Thomas, late a laborer of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances

PROBLEMS OF GOVERNMENT-ADDRESS BY SENATOR BARKLEY

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] at the annual Democratic banquet of Kansas Democrats at Topeka, Kans., February 22, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Democrats, I am grateful to my friends in Kansas for the cordial invitation which brings me here on the birthday of the Father of his Country to discuss with you some of the problems which confront our people and their Government. It is not easy to depart from Washington during a busy session of Congress with measures of vast importance pending which may affect the welfare of the people for years or decades to come. My excuse for coming to your State, if I need an excuse, is the belief that now and then someone in the midst of the consideration of these great problems in the Congress and in the Capitol ought to take a little time off to bring to the people such message as he may have in discussing intimately and frankly what affects them all.

In the discussion of problems of government, those who occupy positions of political responsibility are too often prone to look at all questions from the standpoint of partisan politics. While I am a lifelong and earnest advocate of the policies of the Democratic Party, I hope I may not be foolish enough to claim that all virtue resides in our bosoms and all evil in the bosoms of our opponents. As a matter of course I am proud of the history and the accom-Fellow Democrats, I am grateful to my friends in Kansas for the resides in our bosoms and all evil in the bosoms of our opponents. As a matter of course I am proud of the history and the accomplishments of American democracy. I am proud that Thomas Jefferson was its father and Andrew Jackson its great pioneer and effective advocate. I am proud that Grover Cleveland emphasized its rugged honesty, and that Woodrow Wilson gave to it a vision which lifted us above the sordid considerations of narrow and selfish individualism and crowned it with something of a mass responsibility.

I am proud that Franklin Roosevelt combines the philosophy of Jefferson, the courage and driving power of Jackson, the rugged honesty of Cleveland, and the broad humanitarian conceptions of Woodrow Wilson.

No man ever assumed the leadership of a nation under circumstances more distressing or discouraging. We had seen our commerce with other nations dwindle from $10,000,000,000 to little more than two billions. We had seen the smoke of industry fade from the skies and millions of honest God-fearing and hard-working men thrown out of employment and deprived of an opportunity to earn an honest living. We had seen agriculture collapse until the farmers were compelled to produce what feeds and clothes the world for less than the cost of that production. And we had seen the agencies of credit which had been set up for the enefit of agriculture completely cease to perform their expected functions.

We had seen the total collapse of our banking system as ev We had seen the total collapse of our banking system as evidenced in the failure of more banks in the 4 years prior to the inauguration of Mr. Roosevelt than had failed in all the history of the American Nation, and we had seen more banks fail in the United States in that period than had failed in all the rest of the

We had seen State after State declare banking holidays in order to give temporary protection to institutions in which the people had lost their confidence.

And as a result of this we saw the American people losing confidence not only in their economic, industrial, and social structures, but losing confidence in the very political institutions for which they had sacrificed in peace and in war alike. In the midst of this national gloom President Roosevelt took the helm of our ship of state.

I need not undertake in detail to chronicle all of the accomplishments of his administration from March 4, 1933, to this date. And when I say "his administration "I mean not only the executive but the legislative branch of our Government, because no Executive, however wise or powerful, can accomplish much in the field of legislation for recovery without the cordial cooperation of the elected representatives of the people.

The history of our efforts to restore confidence in the banking system is one of the brightest chapters in the history of financial legislation. By a stroke of broadness unequaled the President declared a national banking holiday by closing the banks until they could be reopened under circumstances that would inspire new confidence among the people. Legislation was enacted pronew confidence among the people. Legislation was enacted providing a new charter for a stronger banking system than has ever existed in the history of the Nation. As part of this new charter Congress undertook to guarantee to practically all of the depositors in all of our banks—State and National—that their deposits would be available when called for.

Under the new legislation and the new guidance of those placed in charge of this vital function of our Government, we have increased our deposits in the past year and a half by more than $6,000,000,000. The American people now believe in the integrity of their financial institutions.

increased our deposits in the past year and a half by more than $6,000,000,000. The American people now believe in the integrity of their financial institutions.

I have referred to the collapse of the farm credit system which was set up for the benefit of American agriculture during the administration of Woodrow Wilson. Men in and out of Congress, immediately prior to the inauguration of the new deal, doubted whether the farm credit system could ever be restored. For more than a year it had utterly ceased to function. Doleful and pessimistic men preached its funeral in public forum and private drawing room. But before the Roosevelt administration was 6 months old, the farm credit system had taken on new life because it had a new leadership, and all over this Nation it has not only restored its power to function, but it has restored the confidence of the American farmer. Hundreds of thousands of farms have been rescued from the auctioneer, and the morale of the farmer has been restored and preserved.

We found a vast and unsalable agricultural surplus, which rested like a mountain upon the backs of depressed farmers. This unsalable surplus not only added to the aggregate cost of the farmer's production but it depressed the prices of that part of his production for which he found a sale. It was recognized by everybody that unless we could find a market in foreign countries for this unsalable surplus, we could not continue to produce it without disaster to the farmer. Inasmuch as the foreign market for these surpluses had been destroyed by the short-sighted policy of our predecessors, it was necessary to find a way by which to reduce that surplus at least until the American farmer could find a normal market for the products of his fields.

Carping critics may condemn, as they frequently do, that which they do not understand or willfully misrepresent. But the income

Carping critics may condemn, as they frequently do, that which they do not understand or willfully misrepresent. But the income of the American farmer has been increased during the past 2 years by more than a billion dollars per annum. The prices of his products have increased in some instances by more than 100 percent, and on the average between 50 and 75 percent. The American farmer has seen a new vision. He is thrilled by new hope, and looks forward to the realization of his laudable ambition with the full confidence that his Government, and his elected officers, are bending every possible effort to aid him in the solution of his problems.

One of the greatest difficulties encountered by the new admin-

One of the greatest difficulties encountered by the new administration in the very beginning was that of the unprecedented unemployment among the able-bodied laboring men and women of the Nation. It was estimated that more than 13,000,000 workof the Nation. It was estimated that hide than 13,000,000 work-ers were without employment and were walking the streets in search of work, which they could not obtain. It was estimated by the Secretary of Commerce in the last administration that the loss of our trade with foreign nations had been responsible for the loss of employment by more than 3,000,000 American workingmen. But whatever the cause may have been, and wherever the responsibility lay, these men and women were out of work and it was a task of the first magnitude to attempt to restore them to honest and remunerative toil.

honest and remunerative toil.

One of the methods by which this was attempted was shortening hours of labor so as to distribute employment among a larger number of employees. Another method was to abolish the curse of American labor—the exploitation of children in the sweatshops of the country for private greed and indefensible gain.

It was realized also that more abuses existed in the industrial and commercial life of the Nation, which could not be abolished except by the cooperation of business and industry themselves, working also with labor and labor's problems.

except by the cooperation of business and industry themselves, working also with labor and labor's problems.

In order to attempt to solve these correlated questions the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed by Congress and signed by the President. No one would claim that this act was offered, or that it was operated as a panacea for the solution of either industrial, economic, or labor problems; but it is a fact to be noted that nobody offered anything better, either then or since.

It could not have been expected that an act so comprehensive, dealing as it did with the business relationships of millions of our people could have been administered without some misunderdealing as it did with the business relationships of millions of our people, could have been administered without some misunderstanding, some friction, and even some injustice. But even those who have criticized it, and still criticize it, not only offer nothing better in its place but actually protest against its discontinuance. In a hearing before the Finance Committee on the question of giving the President the power to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations many business men appeared to object to the granting of such a power, although it had been frequently granted by our opponents for nearly 75 years. In each instance when these critics and objectors were asked whether they favored the discontinuance of the National Industrial Recovery Act, their reply was in the negative.

While we may find some injustices, which may have come about was in the negative.

While we may find some injustices, which may have come about by the administration of this act, on the whole it has served the interests of American business and of American labor. Whether we give credit to this act or some other act, or a combination of acts, the role of the unemployed has been reduced from 13,000,000 to seven or eight millions of people. On the average, the American wage scale has increased. Shorter hours of labor have been provided for the American laboring men and thousands of our children have been freed from the sweatshops to enter the portals of schools and playgrounds.

We are now engaged in the effort by additional legislation to preserve what has been found helpful in the National Industrial Recovery Act, and to discard what has been found unwise or impracticable. And this program commends itself to American business and to American labor, as well as to all classes of our presents.

people.

There has been an endless dispute raging among the American people ever since October 1929 as to whether the collapse in the stock market caused the depression, or whether the shadow of an approaching depression caused the collapse in the stock market. I have neither the time nor the inclination to enter into a discussion of this mooted question. But we do know that prior to that date, Americans of all classes were encouraged to forsake the ordinary pursuits of industry and of labor to try their hand at the wheel of fortune. Prices for securities that had no foundation in the condition of the concerns these securities represented were pyramided by the speculative mania which was openly encouraged by those occupying the highest political positions in the Nation. Nation

During that hectic period when securities for a few days at a time would tend to decline, the then Secretary of the Treasury would fulminate from the Treasury Building to the effect that stocks were not yet high enough and that there was no just rea-would fulminate from the Treasury Building to the effect that stocks were not yet high enough and that there was no just reason for not expecting or desiring that they should go higher. And when the optimistic prognostications of the head of the Treasury did not operate to turn the tide back toward speculative inflation, the President himself, on more than one occasion, gave oral and written encouragement to the speculating mania.

As a result millions of people lost the savings of a lifetime, and paper values never justified by actual conditions collapsed so fundamentally and carried with that a train of evil events so disastrous as to destroy nearly half the paper value of all securities held by the American people. In an effort to protect the people of the Nation from such a disaster in the future, we have provided for Government supervision of the issue of securities and their sale upon the exchanges of the country, and those who during the process of legislation, condemned these regulations as unwarranted, now hall them as wise and proper measures of protection to the American investor.

As a result of the terrific conditions which have existed for the past 5 years, the question of relief for unemployment has been uppermost in the minds of men in private and in public life. Prior to the arrival of the present depression, charity and public relief for the most part, were dispensed by private organizations, or by local government in the community where it was needed. I need not discuss whether a reversal of this policy could have been avoided by the assumption of greater local responsibility, but the President and Congress were soon confronted with the dilemma of permitting American men, women, and children to starve by the wholesale, or bringing the agencies of the Federal Government to their rescue by the expenditure of public funds. There was only one answer to this dilemma. If cities and counties and States had exhausted their means of taxation, or their revenue-raising powers, and were still deficient i the situation. Even if local authorities did not exert their full authority in the raising of local funds, likewise the Nation could not ignore its obligations. Men, women, and children could not be left to the tender mercles of the elements and refused the comforts of food, shelter, and of clothing. We could not in this Nation of theoretical, if not actual plenty, brought about by any possible maldisposition and maladjustment of our economic system, permit men, women, and children to die of hunger or exposure.

tem, permit men, women, and children to die of hunger or exposure.

This obligation, recognized by the Nation as a national problem, has been a great burden upon our financial resources. It is and will be a continued burden until normal conditions have returned and private industry has been able to absorb unemployment and private and local agencies of relief are able to resume this burden. In his message to Congress in January, the President laid before us what seems to be a constructive and far-sighted program of work and relief. We are now debating in Congress whether we shall appropriate nearly $5,000,000,000 for work and relief or shall abandon work altogether and appropriate $2,000,000,000 for relief. We are debating whether we shall take men off the rolls of charity and at a wage which will enable them to live in decency, enroll them in a program of constructive work and permanently add to the value and the wealth of the Nation. We are debating whether in order to get men off of the rolls of charity we shall employ them on public or other works, at rates of pay equal to the rates of wage paid by private industry. It seems to me there is but one answer to this question. We cannot afford to place the Government in competition with private industry by offering a wage so attractive that men will desert private industry to become enrolled on Government pay rolls. At the same time, we ought to pay a wage sufficiently high to induce men to leave the rolls of charity to become enrolled among those who are earning what they receive at the hands of the Federal Government.

We have criticized and are being criticized by those who have no program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation program of their own because these great agencies of the Nation p

We have criticized and are being criticized by those who have no program of their own because these great agencies of the National Government have for the time unbalanced our Budget. All of us would be glad if each year and each month our National Budget could be balanced, just as we would be delighted if our personal budgets could be balanced. But there has never been a great crisis in the national history involving large and unusual expenditures when the Federal Budget could be balanced.

It was not balanced during the Civil War. It was not balanced during the depression of 1873. It was not balanced during the depression of 1893. It was certainly not balanced during the great World War. During that great struggle, which lasted, so far as we were concerned, for only 19 months, we expended more than $30,000,000,000, raised by taxation and by the sale of Liberty bonds. That was an amount greater than the total cost of the National Government from the Declaration of Independence in 1776 to the time of the declaration of war against Germany in 1917. While that expenditure from our standpoint as a nation was justified, it involved the destruction of billions of dollars' worth of property and hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of human lives. human lives human lives.

We have been compelled during recent years to unbalance our national budget. We have increased the national debt by seven or eight billions of dollars, but my friends, let us bear in mind that not a dollar of this money has been expended to destroy a single home, nor a single piece of property, that has been accumulated by the toll and sweat of an American citizen. Not a dollar of it has been expended to sniff out a single human life home of women in this are any other Netion. While I voted as a dollar of it has been expended to sniff out a single human life born of woman in this or any other Nation. While I voted as a Member of Congress to enter the World War, and voted for every measure put forward to win it hastily and completely, I would rather spend $1,000,000 to save American lives and American property, than to vote for a single dollar to destroy them here, or elsewhere, in the world. We do not have to apologize for our efforts to preserve the lives and the property of the American people, or to restore and maintain their high morale as free and independent citizens of the world's greatest Nation efforts to preserve the lives and the property of the American people, or to restore and maintain their high morale as free and independent citizens of the world's greatest Nation.

These are but a few of the deeds we have accomplished and are seeking to accomplish. We could not expect to carry forth a great humanitarian program without opposition and condemnation among the short-sighted, or the reactionaries. George Washington had to fight a similar element to gain American independence. Thomas Jefferson had to fight a similar element to obtain the rights of democracy for the American people, and Andrew Jackson met the same type of opposition in his fight against entrenched privilege. Abraham Lincoln, was confronted at every step by critic and denouncer, by the forsaker and by the intellectual superior who arrogated to himself all wisdom and all knowledge, and condemned Lincoln because he came forward and represented the great body of the common people. But in spite of opposition and bitter condemnation, George Washington established the Nation. Thomas Jefferson established a democracy, Andrew Jackson proclaimed it to the common man, and Abraham Lincoln preserved the Union and became the Nation's greatest martyr. Likewise, Woodrow Wilson fought the forces of reaction in bringing a new freedom into the lives of the American people, inspired by the same fundamental conceptions of public responsibility. Guided by the same providential hand, I predict that Franklin D. Roosevelt, acclaimed today as the hope of the Nation without regard to party, color, or religion, will take his place among those who have given and have preserved the rights, the privileges, and the hopes of millions of people here and throughout the world.

We have not sought and are not seeking to destroy individual privileges, and the hopes of millions of people here and throughout the world.

We have not sought and are not seeking to destroy individual liberty. Every man who enjoys civilized society must surrender something that might be deemed an original liberty in order that organized society may live. But in so doing, he acquires a greater and a more lasting freedom, the freedom to live under law and under the protection of the Government; the freedom to work and support his family; the freedom to educate his children; the freedom to enjoy all of the necessities and some of comforts and luxuries of life; the freedom to travel now and then to see something of the beauties of God's great world; the freedom to vote and to have a voice in his Government; the freedom to be unhampered by the strong or the powerful through the agencies of protection given to him by a just and an honest Government.

I challenge those who complain that we have robbed the people of their liberties to point to a single instance where they have lost any liberty which they should have retained. I challenge those who criticize everything we have done to tell us what they would have done if the people had placed responsibility in their hands instead of ours. I challenge them to give us a bill of particulars, containing what they ever proposed, or what they now propose, as a substitute for what we are attempting to do to rescue the American people.

American people.

and seek to administer a blow while they are not looking.

As I stated at the outset, we do not claim a monopoly of virtues or wisdom. Neither do we attribute to our opponents a monopoly of folly or of evil, but the American people are overwhelmingly convinced that Franklin D. Roosevelt and those who are working with him, whether they be Democrats, Progressives, or Republicans, have been and are putting forward a superhuman effort to lift the American people and the American Nation out of the bogs of despondency and of hopelessness, and place them upon a firm foundation of equity, of equality, of justice, and of public service, which will enable them to enjoy the fruits of their labors and to enjoy a fair share of our natural resources and opportunities.

In behalf of such a consummation, we summon not only the

In behalf of such a consummation, we summon not only the hosts of democracy, whom you and I in part represent, but we invite the sympathetic and constructive cooperation of all Americans without regard to political, religious, or economic convictions, whose chief desire in life is to serve the cause of popular government and of popular rights.

NARCOTIC DRUG EVIL

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the radio broadcast of Mr. Hayne Davis, vice president of the Narcotic Association for Official Cooperation; Hon. Charles Curtis, of Kansas; and Hon. Key Pittman, of Nevada, January 23, 1935, relative to the narcotic-drug evil and the necessity of the States of our Union acting with respect to the matter while their legislatures are in session at the present time.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON, CHARLES CURTIS

Fellow citizens, on March 4, 1932, the following message was sent to the Senate of the United States by the then President.

sent to the Senate of the United States by the then President.

"I transmit herewith a convention for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, dated July 13, 1931, and signed by the Representatives of the United States of America and 43 other countries represented at the conference for the limitation of the manufacture of narcotic drugs. In view of the benefit which would accrue to the United States from the ratification of the convention as set forth in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, and the report of the delegates of the United States to the conference, to both of which the attention of the Senate is invited, and because of the deep interest taken in the United States in the humanitarian aspect of the provisions of the document, I strongly commend the convention to the favorable consideration of the Senate and request their advice and consent to ratification of the convention.

"(Signed) HERBERT HOOVER."

The report of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, referred to in this message from the President, said among other things:
"The principal problem of narcotic-law enforcement in the "The principal problem of narcotic-iaw enforcement in the United States is that of preventing the unlawful introduction of narcotic drugs. It is foreign overproduction which supplies the illicit international traffic. The domestic manufacture of the drugs in the United States is limited so closely to the medical needs of the country that diversion of the home-manufactured product is comparatively negligible and the illicit traffic finds its source of supply in drugs which are smuggled in from abroad. Recent enforcement activities of the newly created Federal Narcotic Bureau, in conjunction with other governmental agencies, have produced gratifying results in curbing the unlawful introduction of narcotics into the country, but it needs no argument to establish the advantage to the United States which would follow from the control of the traffic at the source through the elimination of overproduction. This the convention under discussion is designed to accomplish. If it is made effective and enforced by the high contracting parties, it may confidently be expected to reduce to the amounts needed for medical and scientific purposes the quantities of these dangerous substances manufactured.

"It is in view of these advantages that the delegation strangle."

amounts needed for medical and scientific purposes the quantities of these dangerous substances manufactured.

"It is in view of these advantages that the delegation strongly recommends that the treaty be ratified. Ratification by this Government will no doubt have a strongly persuasive effect in bringing about ratification on the part of countries which, for some reason, may doubt whether the treaty will eventually become effective. Ratification by the United States will add the weight of this country's cooperation toward insuring the effectiveness of the convention. The extent to which the convention is adopted as an obligation by the powers of the world will be the measure of the benefit which may be confidently expected to accrue to the United States through the resultant restriction of the flow of contraband drugs which is an inevitable result of overproduction. overproduction.

"(Signed) HENRY L. STIMSON."

On the 30th day of March 1932, the Senate Committee on On the 30th day of March 1932, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations made a report to the Senate recommending the ratification of this treaty, and it was ratified on the following day. Senator Borah, of Idaho, was chairman of the committee which recommended ratification. The vote on the resolution was unanimous. So that in March 1932 there was no difference of opinion among the constituted authorities of the Nation on this important question. And there is no difference of opinion among us now on this question. We are all agreed that this treaty is for the best interests of all our people in every State of the Union. Union.

I shall repeat, in order to properly emphasize it, one part of the report made to the President in March 1932 by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson: "Ratification by this Government will no doubt have a strongly persuasive effect in bringing about ratification on the part of countries which, for some reason, may doubt whether the treaty will eventually become effective."

"The extent to which the convention is adopted as an obliga-tion by the powers of the world will be the measure of the benefit which may be confidently expected to accrue to the United States through the resultant restriction of the flow of contraband drugs, which is an inevitable result of overproduction."

The early action on this treaty by the United States—only 2 weeks after its ratification by Nicaragua, the first of all countries to ratify—did in fact have influence in securing favorable action by the requisite number of nations on or before the day fixed, and the number has now risen to 52. Only a dozen nations have and the number has now risen to 52. Only a dozen nations have not taken action so far.

The benefits expected to accrue to the United States were stated by the United States delegates to the narcotic conference and by Secretary of State Stimson, to be in proportion to the extent to which the treaty would be adopted as an obligation by the nations. The benefits are therefore great, according to this forecast. They have been found very great in actual experience. For nearly all the nations have now ratified and are effectively carrying out the terms of this treaty. As an instance, consider what was stated by Secretary Hull in a broadcast, similar to this one, in July of last year:

was stated by Secretary Hull in a broadcast, similar to this one, in July of last year:

"Furthermore, it is a pleasure to express the appreciation of the American Government for the energetic and effective steps which the Turkish Government has taken to suppress the illicit traffic in morphine from Turkey, which only a few years ago had assumed such alarming proportions. The United States was the principal victim of this traffic, and the action taken by the Turkish Government temperature of the greatest assistance. ernment to put an end to it has been of the greatest assistance to the American Government in its efforts to combat the evil of narcotic-drug addiction.

"Turning from the steps which Turkey has taken to make the opium and drug conventions effective in her territories, I venture to call your attention to the fact that certain further steps remain to be taken here in the United States to carry out the requirements of these conventions.

"In meeting the obligations of the United States under the opium and drug conventions the Federal Government is obliged to look to the various States of the Union for help, as under our Constitution certain of the legislation needed to implement these treaties can be enacted only by the State legislatures. The proposed uniform State narcotic-drug act was drafted by the conference of commissioners on uniform State laws and has received the approval of the American Bar Association and has been recomthe approval of the American Bar Association and has been recommended for passage by the house of delegates of the American Medical Association. Various provisions have been embodied in this proposed uniform State statute on narcotics, with a view of carrying out obligations of the United States, under the Hague opium convention of 1912 and the narcotics limitation convention of 1931. This act is expected to come before a number of State legislatures for consideration at their coming sessions, and it is hoped that the importance of these provisions will not be overlooked.

"(Signed) CORDELL HULL.

" JULY 9, 1934."

Secretary Stimson was right in 1932 in his forecast of the bene fits to accrue to this country through general acceptance of the treaty of 1931. These benefits are great. Secretary Hull is right row.

To get the full benefit for the American people from ratification of this treaty by our country, and by nearly all other countries, the States must adopt the proposed uniform narcotic-drug act, or its equivalent. Nine States have already done so. Through adoption of this act by all the 35 State legislatures now in session another great advance will be made in the crusade against the narcotic-drug evil. Needed protection for the people of each State will be supplied here at home. The hands of the National Government will be properly upheld by the States in its fulfillment of its proper part in combating this evil in its international aspect.

As presiding officer of the Senate at the time this narcotic treaty was ratified, I am glad to take part in the campaign to secure adoption of the uniform narcotic-drug act by the several States. This is clearly for the good of the people of each and every State and for the good of the United States in its cooperation with other nations in the international concert for the general welfare of all people, and I hope the several States will enact the necessary legislation.

"The Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Sen-"The Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, Hon. He can speak, therefore, for his sixty-odd colleagues who voted with him for that treaty and who still represent their respective States in the United States Senate; and besides that, Nevada is Senator Pittman's State and Nevada was the first of all our States to adopt the uniform narcotic-drug act, March 1933.

"It is altogether fitting, therefore, that Senator Pittman should unite today with the former Vice President of the United States in sounding a clarion call to the 35 States whose legislatures are now in session to rally around 9 States which have already adopted this act, and so to achieve interstate accord on narcotics as international accord has been achieved through ratification of the narcotic treaty of 1931 by more than 50 political subdivisions of the world. # ADDRESS OF HON. KEY PITTMAN

My friends, I have had the pleasure of listening to a part of the address of my friend, the ex-Vice President of the United States. He has covered very largely this subject. What I may say must be largely extemporaneous. I know, however, that you will agree with me that there is no subject, there is no problem, more vital than this. In these times, when there is poverty and distress, when there is crime, when murder is a business, we must think. The narcotic problem has been with us for years. Patriotic men have given their lives to it. The ex-Vice President and myself have been students of the subject for years, but not as long as others have. We are trying to meet it; we are going to meet it. I think that it will be admitted that most of the crime in this country comes from those who are abnormal, those who have de-

I think that it will be admitted that most of the crime in this country comes from those who are abnormal, those who have degenerated by reason of narcotics. We speak of Dillinger and crimes of that type—they are not natural to our country; they didn't exist once. We do not have to go into the effects of narcotics—that has been talked for years gone by.

What do we want? We want action. We are entitled to action. There are 35 legislatures in session or about to be convened in session. Their action is necessary; it is the duty of the Governors to call to the attention of these legislatures the act that has been already passed by a number of States.

Now may I briefly give you the history so far as we have gone?

Now, may I briefly give you the history so far as we have gone? Now, may I briefly give you the history so far as we have gone? It has been given largely by Mr. Curtis, the ex-Vice President, with whom I had the honor to serve in the Senate. On July 9, 1934, at the celebration of the first anniversary of the going into operation of the Narcotic Limitations Treaty of 1931, the Turkish Ambassador and the Secretary of State of the United States made statements in striking contrast, substantially as follows. After reading the remarkable message sent by President Kemal, of Turkey, for broadcasting at that celebration the Ambassador, Mehmet Munir Bey, said that legal measures are now in operation in Turkey in perfect accord with the treaty obligations assumed by that nation.

Secretary Hull of the United States, on the other hand, said in substance that such legal measures are not in operation in our country and cannot be until the several States enact legislation needed to accomplish this purpose, and that under our Constitution only the States are empowered to enact such legislation. May I say to you that Turkey, which supplied most of the opium of the world, whose people made a living out of it, under the leadership of their great President Mustafa Kemal, stopped producing the opium poppy and hemp! The difference between the legal situation in Turkey and the United States is all the more striking when it is remembered that the United States took the initiative in 1909 for securing international accord on narcotics by proposing the first International Narcotic Conference ever held. This fact was graciously referred to by the Turkish Ambassador at the very outset, and it was just in July of last year that President Kemal, at the celebration on that day, referred to the American initiative. My friends, we have had international action on this matter. We have Turkey, which was the chief supplier of narcotics that intoxicated and dissipated the mentality of the world, to really take the first step and stop the production of narcotics.

We have a treaty among nations to limit its production to medical needs, to limit its export, to limit its import, to limit its sale. We are now calling on the States of our Union to pass the laws which seem essential to entire protection in this matter. It has been a wonderful victory, a remarkable victory, a victory in the sense that people who made their living off of this unfortunate misuse of narcotics were practically the first to stop its production. We who understand its ravages, we who understand that it is unfortunately too often the foundation for crime, crime among the young, we who understand these things are participating in this campaign to secure needed narcotic legislation. Our National Government has participating today, we are calling on you as legislators, to act.

I am proud, I am proud to say that my State—Nevada—was the first to enact the general statute agreed upon by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws for protection against the misuse of narcotics.

These are the States which have already adopted this act: Nevada, March 1933; Florida, May 1933; New York, May 1933; New Jersey, June 1933; Virginia, March 1934; Rhode Island, April 1934; South Carolina, April 1934; Kentucky, June 1934; Louisiana, Decem-

Where are the other 35 States? They will act in the next 60 days, and we have every confidence how they will act.

In concluding the broadcast Mr. Davis said:

"Every citizen of the United States who is listening to this broadcast is represented in the legislature of his State by two persons—a member of the senate and a member of the lower house.

"You can call upon your representatives in the State legislature to enact the proposed uniform narcotic-drug act. This act, or its equivalent, should be enacted at the present session of the legislatures of 35 States. You can assist in bringing to pass this 'consummation devoutly to be wished.' Grasp this opportunity.

"You can also write to Narcotic Association, 578 Madison Avenue, New York City, or in care of station to which you are listening. Enclose a stamped envelop (any size), addressed to yourself, and you will receive interesting and useful literature on narcotics, which will enable you to participate continuously in a small or large way, according to your circumstances, in this world-wide crusade against one of the worst enemies of mankind."

THE NEW DEAL-ARTICLE BY DONALD R. RICHBERG

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that a brief article, entitled "The Challenge of Tomorrow," published in the magazine Real Life, from the pen of Mr. Donald R. Richberg, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The challenge of tomorrow is essentially the challenge to face facts—not as they were, or as they might have been, but as they

of course, this is easily said; and many people honestly and sincerely believe they are facing facts as they are when they are only facing facts as they once were. Without laying claim to any special knowledge or insight, I have sought in the past, and I am seeking now, to see things free from illusions and prejudice, and to keep in mind that what is true today may not be true tomorrow. What are the objectives of the new deal? There is no secret or mystery about this. Broadly speaking, the new deal is trying to end the chaos in American industrial and agricultural life. That is not a hard definition to understand.

For example, the new deal is seeking to restore a sound banking system; it is seeking to coordinate and balance industry and agriculture to the end that they may stand on their own feet; and, above and beyond all, it is seeking to restore economic security to those millions of Americans who are today without it.

Is that an ambitious program? Perhaps. But as the President of the United States has said, "We are on our way." There can be no turning back

What is the alternative? Shall we return to the economic jungle of the past? Are we going to junk all those instrumentalities that have been built up through the past to correct disorder and injustice in the economic world? Or shall we continue to improve them?

There are those who complain about Government interference in business. One would assume that these people must believe in a philosophy of everybody for himself and the devil take the hindmost

As a matter of fact, they do not. They believe in some Government interference in business. If they are small business men and farmers, they believe that the Government ought to regulate the railroads. This was begun in 1887. Business men, big or small, would not like to see that regulation taken away. Many of these same business men and farmers believe in Government sponwhy? Because they want lower freight rates, and so they are willing to put the Government in that business.

Others wish to see the Government in the shipping business, building a merchant marine; others want more Government canals and highways; others advocate more and more regulation of banking. Almost everyone is willing to have the Government interfere to destroy an evil from which he is suffering, or to give him a lift.

It was, indeed, an excessive faith in so-called "rugged individualism" (in this modern age when a life of rugged individualism had become impossible for the great mass of people) which produced the chaos in which we floundered until the leadership of President Roosevelt brought about a new deal.

of President Roosevelt brought about a new deal.

The old theory essentially was that those who were willing to work would always eat. It assumed that those who starved, or who lived on little or nothing, suffered because they were lazy or incompetent. Some people even believe that today. They take no account of those who want to work, who want to support themselves and their families, but can find no means of doing so.

And so the Federal Government has mobilized our national provides to end this condition. These wars not more words. This

And so the Federal Government has mobilized our national energies to end this condition. These are not mere words. This has been done. The improved prices of agricultural products, the rising business turnover, and the millions of workers who have been reemployed are facts. And the future holds the promise that the progress already achieved will continue.

Great progress has been made toward eliminating child labor; slum elimination has at least been started; agriculture has been generally organized for self-help; the banking system has been restored to public health and confidence; we have ceased foolish efforts to support foreign debtors by loaning them more money; the financial pressure on millions of citizens and private concerns has been relieved; and business men, farmers, and workers are being organized for self-help and to insure fair competition.

In these first 2 years of reconstruction, the foundations have being organized for self-help and to insure fair competition. In these first 2 years of reconstruction, the foundations have been laid for a political-economic system wherein private enterprise can compete for individual profit and at the same time cooperate to maintain a proper balance between the interests of agriculture, trade, industry, management, labor, and consumer. If the private managers of our financial and industrial institutions are ready and willing to build a new industrial structure on these foundations, now is their opportunity.

Let us look at these opportunities.

We have, for example, a vast need in this country for better housing. Millions of new homes can be built with the ample material and labor available. There is plenty of credit which could be employed to finance this construction. And there is plenty of man power.

plenty of man power.

Further, there are millions of workers who are now able, or would be able, to lease or buy these homes. Production—whether it is of automobiles, radios, moving pictures, whatnot—enriches the lives and fortunes of all the people.

I believe profoundly that the rebuilding of the homes of America will make for a far greater advance of our civilization than any other one development.

any other one development.

But is this all of the picture?

Decidedly not. There are other ways of employing man power and reviving the economic resources of all the people. Millions of workers and billions of dollars could be profitably employed in the next 10 years replacing obsolete machinery and improving the mechanisms of production and transportation. By these methods, more necessities and greater comforts could be distributed to more people than ever before.

That is the way our civilization advances.

There are those today who say that private initiative is too weak, and private capital too timid, to carry us forward. We are solemnly told that management and labor will not cooperate, that both lack the necessary vision.

that both lack the necessary vision.

I do not believe that the courage and energies of American business men and financiers have been exhausted in the last few years. For example, in the growth and development of the N. R. A. we witnessed day after day, week after week, month after month, the vigor with which all the elements of our industrial life responded to an opportunity for self-service combined with public service.

The choice before us is here and now:

We must bring about the employment of four or five million workers in the near future, either through a private expansion of private enterprise, or through further governmental activities. To every home and fireside in America this problem is a real one.

The President is attacking the unemployment problem all along the line, and the Nation is determined to help him win this fight.

It is cruel and short-sighted to argue that the Government ought to cut down its relief expenditures to the smallest dole that will possibly keep alive the idle workers and their families. That cannot be the program of those of us who want to fulfill our obligations to our fellowmen.

our obligations to our fellowmen.

Said a stiff-necked friend to me the other day: "I never thought it was the business of government to provide a man with a job."

This attitude rises out of the economics of a bygone age. I reminded my friend that when we deprive a fellow citizen of an opportunity to work, from whatever cause, we are in all essential respects depriving him of his liberty.

The Constitution of the United States is an instrument primarily designed to protect and advance human liberty in these United States. That is its fundamental purpose.

The guaranties of liberty in the Constitution must be trans-

United States. That is its fundamental purpose.

The guaranties of liberty in the Constitution must be translated by any government under that Constitution into guaranties of an opportunity to earn a living by honest, respectable labor, if they are to be effective guaranties of human freedom.

There is nothing startling about this.

The freedom of those of us who live in the cities today, as well as most of those who live on the farms, depends on our ability to exchange the things which we make for the many products of our fellow men. This freedom, which we all crave, must then be guaranteed today—not by letting people alone, but by making sure that they are so organized for cooperative action that the continuous interchange of necessary products and services will not break down and leave hosts of people theoretically free but practically deprived of freedom to earn a living.

This is the challenge of tomorrow and the essential meaning of

This is the challenge of tomorrow and the essential meaning of the new deal, as I understand it. We are all bound together in one common fabric, and the unemployment from which we are suffering today is primarily a social problem. It cannot be relieved by individual effort. It calls for collective planning and concerted action.

I am not a state socialist. I believe that state control of industry means the death of individual liberty. I am one of those who believe that the willing workers of our industrial and commercial world should be able to rely on private enterprise for their continuous support. Most of us recognize the dangers that lie in even a temporary assumption of part of this responsibility by the Government.

But when private enterprise fails to maintain this fundamental guarantee of liberty for millions of our fellow citizens, the Government cannot shirk its ultimate responsibility.

Let us realize that in less than 2 years, under the masterly leadership of President Roosevelt, the Government has fulfilled its first and second obligations:

It has provided relief. And it has mobilized private business and strengthened the foundations of private enterprise. But either private enterprise must now reemploy the idle or the Government must meet its final obligation to see to it that all its able-bodied citizens have the opportunity to earn a living.

citizens have the opportunity to earn a living.

Critics of the N. R. A. have made much out of the difficulty of establishing satisfactory standards of fair competition.

I confess that, despite 7 years of university training and a lifelong study of economic questions, I cannot speak with the assurance of those who advise us just how human affairs could be wisely managed if human beings would stop acting like human beings. Having practiced law for over 30 years in behalf of business men, labor organizations, and public bodies, and having had 17 months' experience in the N. R. A., I hope, however, I can qualify as a graduate of the school of hard knocks.

In this capacity I would assert that no process of lawmaking or codification should be expected to establish immediately a fair competitive system.

competitive system.

But it can do this—and that is what I regard as profoundly important—it can provide the basis for a gradual improvement in the conditions under which business men compete with each other and employers and employees struggle to reap separate benefits from common gains.

It is this educational process that has made the N. R. A. a mile-stone in human progress.

Of course, there have been tremendous difficulties.

The greatest of these, perhaps, was the attempt to accomplish too much in too short a time.

Since June 1933 many theories of business regulation were tried out. Many of these were heartly opposed by academic advisers who had both brains and common sense.

Some of these experiments in certain lines of business proved successful. Some were not. But they were all educational.

The choice must ultimately be presented to industry. It will be forced to choose between a competitive system and a system of controls which may in the long run destroy that competitive

Managers and labor leaders who believe devoutly in freedom of Managers and labor leaders who believe devoutly in freedom of contract, collective bargaining, and fair competition should hesitate long before devising legislative controls of their affairs. They may find too late that they have put their own necks into a noose that will strangle them.

In the same way, rigid rules of business practice may appear to be wise to those upon whom they rest lightly, but they may impose unjustified hardship on others. The question of the justice or injustice of the alleged hardship is the issue at stake.

Most business men may approve in principle of fixing minimum wages and maximum hours. But what should be minimum wages and maximum hours is not an academic question; it is a practical one.

one.

The rules adopted should be flexible enough to fit actual conditions. They should not be regarded as the last word on the subject. They should be left subject to improvement by collective bargaining. They should protect the interests of employers and employees and the general public.

Of one thing we may feel certain: So long as the Government confines its efforts in the regulation of business to the preservation of fair competition, the rewards of industry will flow with reasonable steadiness to those who perform social services of corresponding value. But it is equally clear that we cannot establish theoretical standards of what are fair wages or prices or property values. All history teaches us, and every political economist knows, that there are no reliable measuring rods available for such a judgment. judgment judgment.

You might, for example, make a good guess as to what is relatively a fair wage for one worker or a fair price for one article. But if you undertook, as a Government official, to fix fair wages for all workers and fair prices for all goods and services you would find it necessary to plan and control the economic destiny and development of the Nation in accordance with some arbitrary theory of the purpose and direction of all human progress.

We cannot undertake to end all inequalities of fortune and to establish unvarying economic and social justice. We can only establish rules of fair play that can be changed from time to time as new occasions teach new duties.

as new occasions teach new duties.

Our industrial civilization is only 50 years old. In that space of time, organized groups have devoted themselves persistently to obtaining special advantages through the use of political

They have used property laws, patent laws, tariff acts, regulatory laws, and even the control of natural resources as aids in a competitive struggle dominated far too often by unscrupulous, greedy, and cruel men, who set the rules of a game which high-minded and generous men have been forced to play, or lose their all.

These conditions were the background of the National Industrial Resources and the second set of the person and the person

These conditions were the background of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Long before 1929 it became obvious that the old system must be transformed—that, in fact, the rules of industrial competition must be rewritten and made a part of the law of the land so that honest, humane, and fair business practices could be established as the basis of a new economic era.

But for 3 years after 1929 we waited in vain for an enlightened, aggressive leadership. During those 3 years I attended many a conference of ownership and management and labor. Out of each conference came the same conclusion: The President himself must take command of a national movement or it could not be successful. successful.

Finally, in the spring of 1933 there came into office a President who was willing to assume the responsibility, and whose inaugural address of courage and confidence electrified the Nation.

For the privilege of serving under such leadership I am profoundly grateful. Of course, any constructive program invites criticism, and personal attacks on public officials are the easiest and most useless form of criticism.

For example, I don't see any good served by a newspaper cartoon which shows me carrying a red flag and describes me as a Socialist, when I have a consistent record of having all my life bitterly opposed the theories and programs of state socialism. But I have learned that only a small part of the misrepresentation of public officials is deliberate and malicious. Most of it simply springs from an honest misunderstanding or difference of opinion as to the best method of accomplishing a common purpose.

the best method of accomplishing a common purpose.

It is hard not to be impatient with unfair criticisms and misrepresentations of the policies and purposes of the national administration. But I have tried also to realize that many men, confused and uncertain as to what was actually being done, or what were the objects of the Government, were honestly in fear of the destruction of liberty by public officials who were in fact just as honestly doing all in their power to preserve our constitutional liberties.

If, however, we are going to seek a better understanding, we must not lose sight of the driving necessity which has forced our Government, first, into sweeping measures of emergency relief, and second, into their continuance, until we are able to work out some measures of permanent reconstruction in our political and economic system so that our free institutions and our individual freedom and security may be safeguarded against a return to economic chaos.

In this day when there are still millions of uncompleted when economic chaos.

In this day, when there are still millions of unemployed, when it would be all too easy for us to lose our forward momentum and to start another national slide downhill, no program could be more suicidal than to abandon our new mechanisms of cooperation and to let nature take its ruthless course. It is a time for sober analysis of the gains and losses and the strength and weakness of our cooperative efforts. We must continue them, and we must improve them. There is no patent medicine that will cure our economic tils. economic ills.

Now we are in the period of a definite business recovery. The time is ripe for a permanent advance in business conditions and labor relations. Skeptics will hesitate, stubborn partisans of class interest will hold back, and racketeers will sabotage efforts to promote harmony. But if the forward-looking leaders of industry and labor will cooperate with the efforts of their Government to bring about industrial recovery and industrial peace, they will render a great service to all who follow them and to the general render a great service to an who lond the welfare.

We have heard much lately about the need for certainty as to public policy and the need for assurances that would inspire confidence. Yet a veteran and impartial newspaperman remarked to me the other day that he had never known a President who had spoken as frankly and fully concerning the policies of his administration as has President Roosevelt.

It can be fairly said that today the chief disturbers of confidence, of his administration as has President Roosevelt.

It can be fairly said that today the chief disturbers of confidence, those who most impede our progress, are those who, out of the confusion of their own minds, or in order to serve selfish interests, continually raise false issues.

We have an administration of the Federal Government dedicated heart and soul to the preservation of our ancient liberties and to the maintenance of a political economic system of competitive individualism, civilized by a social conscience.

That administration is entitled to the support of the vast majority of American citizens who wish to see maintained in Washington a government faithful to American traditions and ideals, which will preserve for them the advantages and opportunities of living under constitutional safeguards of individual freedom.

The challenge of tomorrow is a challenge to the common sense and political judgment of the masses of the American people, not merely a challenge to their Government.

I believe the people and their Government will meet that challenge.

REMARKS BY MR. JUSTICE M'REYNOLDS IN GOLD-CLAUSE CASES

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. Townsend], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the very interesting and illuminating remarks of Mr. Justice McReynolds in the recent gold-clause cases as printed in the Wall Street Journal.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal of Saturday, Feb. 23, 1935] JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS' REMARKS ON GOLD CASE DECISION

From the Wall Street Journal, Washington Bureau

Washington.—A more nearly complete version of Justice Mc-Reynolds' powerful remarks made in the Supreme Court prior to the rendering of the minority opinion in the gold-clause cases is presented herewith. No official stenographic report of the justice's observations was made. They have hitherto been reported only fragmentarily, and it was feared that they were lost to posterity. However, the Wall Street Journal is enabled to present the following which it believes to be substantially the text of what Justice McReynolds said:

"Mr. Justice Van Devanter, Mr. Justice Sutherland, Mr. Justice Butler, and I do not accept the conclusion which has been announced by the Court. To us the record reveals a clear purpose to bring about confiscation of private rights and the repudiation of national obligations. To us these things are powerful, and we cannot believe that the wise men who framed the Constitution intended that they should find shelter within it. But, on the contrary, they wrote there in words that ought not to be mistaken strictly their inhibitions against it.

"We have written down our views, they will be open for your observation. We assume that those of you who have interest enough in the matter to wish to comprehend it will find it possible to read it, therefore I shall not read it in extenso. It may be well, however, in order that you may hear now exactly what results from the conclusions which have been reached, that I should take a few minutes to rehearse to you just what this situation is, not minimizing it, not covering it in a thousand words, but in a plain, simple tale that you may understand without difficulty.

"It is impossible almost to overestimate the result of what has

"It is impossible almost to overestimate the result of what has been done here this day. The Constitution as many of us have understood it, the Constitution that has meant so much to us, has gone. The guaranties which men and women heretofore have supposed protected them against arbitrary action have been swept supposed protected them against aroltrary action have been swept away. The powers of Congress have been enlarged to such an extent no man can foresee their limitations, and we stand as a people today stripped of the very fundamental guaranties which we have heretofore supposed stood between us and arbitrary action. "That statement is made to you with deliberation. It is not overdrawn and in the days to come perhaps as you see this panorama unfold you too will accept the truth.

THREE CLASSES OF CASES

"Now, let us inquire into this particular situation; there are three classes of cases which the court has decided; one class involves the case of private obligations, the other class embraces the solemn promise of the Government, the third class perhaps a still more solemn promise. In harmony with a policy which had been sanctioned by this Government for many, many years, these private individuals entered into contracts which they expected would protect them against a fluctuating currency, a depressed currency, if you will. Depressed currencies are nothing new. They had been known for 1,000 years, 2,000 years. Nero undertook to exercise the power when he was at Rome. Six centuries ago in France it was claimed as a prerogative of the sovereign. Now men who have entered into contracts which were perfectly legitimate have undertaken to protect themselves against it—the lender against a depreciated currency, the borrower against an appreciated currency. And so on the strength of these obligations hundreds of millions of dollars were loaned, and the great corporations of this country have been constructed, and your railroads, your canals, your buildings, almost all the great enterprises of this country have been built up on that. These bonds were sold to men and women and children throughout the world, and with them went the solemn promise that the takers would receive their money in the coin which they had furnished. Now Congress can sweep it away with a word and in face of the facts declare it is against public policy.

away with a word and in face of the facts declare it is against public policy.

"Your Government bonds: Congress in 1900 enacted a solemn statute declaring that the basic money value should be the gold dollar, with 25.8 grains of gold. Congress later directed that in every Government bond there should be inserted a contract to every Government bond there should be inserted a contract to pay in gold, and millions, billions of dollars were issued by this Government with that solemn contract in every one of them.

"During the World War men stood on the street corners and proclaimed the advantage of these bonds; they said 'We are offering you the finest investment the world has ever known, the solemn promise of the United States to pay you in gold dollars. Your country is in danger, your freedom is at stake, we need your assistance, and we beseech you to come and buy these things in order that we may prevail against the enemy', and billions of them were issued on that statement.

"Not only is that true, but on the 2d of May 1933, after the Government commandeered all of the gold of the United States, it issued and sold to the people of this United States five hundred million of these same bonds, with this same solemn promise.

GOLD CERTIFICATES ISSUED

"In 1900 the Government introduced the policy, which had been followed before, of receiving on deposit from citizens gold dollars and issuing to them certificates; the man took his money to the Treasury of the United States and deposited there in gold coin, and he received from that Treasurer a certificate acknowledging the receipt of it and promising to return it to him upon de-mand. Hundreds of millions of those certificates were outstanding, mand. Hundreds of millions of those certificates were outstanding, every one of them bearing the solemn assurance that upon demand the holder could get his gold.

"Now, what happened? That is the situation in April 1933; but under threat of heavy penalties they set out that every dollar of gold, all of the gold within the United States, should come into the Treasury, and directed that the Treasurer should issue for that any form of money that the Government chooses to pay. Millions, hundreds of millions came. We had gone off the gold standard, we had refused to recognize our obligations, or say that we could not. Our currency had depreciated, and for every dollar of bullion that we had received we issued a paper currency to the holder. But that was not enough. Notwithstanding dollar of bullion that we had received we issued a paper currency to the holder. But that was not enough. Notwithstanding on the 2d day of May, five hundred million of gold bonds had been sold to the public, on the 12th of May Congress passed a resolution in which it said it is our duty to raise the price of agricultural commodities and to lower the value of securities. It declared that every dollar issued by the United States, whatever form it took, should be equal to every dollar and gave the President the right to depreciate the gold content of the dollar 50 percent. Now, if the President, in that state of affairs, had reduced the dollar 50 percent, the holders of these gold securities, Government bonds, private bonds, gold certificates, would have Government bonds, private bonds, gold certificates, would have been entitled, under the contract which they held, to be paid the value of the thing which they had contracted for in the currency of the country. That would not have served the purpose, apparently, and so it seemed to be necessary for Congress to pass an act in which it undertook, by direct action, to destroy every one of these contracts for the payment of gold, not only the private ones but its own contracts.

ones but its own contracts.

"Later the President did depreciate the dollar to about 60 cents.

Then all the world was told that for these Government obligations, these private obligations, all other obligations, you must take 60 percent of what you contracted to receive.

NOT AGREEABLE SITUATION

"Now that is the state to which our Government has come, and that is the state of affairs out of which these suits arise. It is not an agreeable situation, it is not a thing which I like to talk about, and God knows I wish I did not have to; but there are some responsibilities which attach to a position upon this bench which men may not ignore, and it seems to be our duty to reveal to the bar, perhaps to the country, in all its nakedness, just what has been accomplished.

"Now a man with one of these private bonds demands payment."

"Now a man with one of these private bonds demands payment. His debtor says, 'I have no gold with which to pay you, and I am prohibited by act of Congress from carrying out the contract which I made with you; here is a paper dollar you must take'; and you are at the end of your road. This Court has held that Congress may do that very thing.

"The holder of a Government bond, which promises to pay in gold, presents it, and the Treasurer says 'here is a paper dollar which you must take for your contract with the Government; we are prohibited from paying out any gold; and if you were paid in gold, you are prohibited from accepting it.' You insist, 'but my contract—you said that I would be paid in gold, or its equivalent.' The Treasurer of a great Nation replies, 'Take this paper dollar.' He comes to this Court, and this Court has held; in one breath it said that Congress has no power to repudiate Government obligations, that the Constitution gives it the right to contract itself and bind the Government for the payment of its bonds in any coin, in any way it chooses to do. any coin, in any way it chooses to do.

CONGRESS REPUDIATES DEST

"In the next breath it says, it is not that; true it is, you have but 60 cents when you have a promise to pay a dollar, but Congress, without authority to repudiate its debts, has made it unlawful for you to accept what it is under obligation to pay, and since it is unlawful for you to accept what you contracted for, it follows that you are not damaged.

"This man doesn't go far on the strength of that reply in which he sees that logic. It seems to us that to reason like that is to give with one hand and take away with the other.

"Now the gold certificates: a man comes in with a hundred."

give with one hand and take away with the other.

"Now, the gold certificates; a man comes in with a hundred thousand dollars of gold certificates, and they recite upon their face that there has been deposited in the Treasury of the United States 100,000 gold dollars, 'which we promise to pay upon presentation of this certificate.' He presents that certificate; what is he told? That we will give you 60 cents for each dollar, 'We offer you 60 cents, you must take it.' 'But', he says, 'you have in the Treasury of the United States my money, $100,000 of it, which I placed with you upon the solemn promise to return it to me upon demand.' The Treasurer says: 'Congress has made it unlawful for us to pay out gold, it has made it unlawful for you to receive or to have gold in your possession', and the conclusion is that, therefore, you are not hurt. 'It is true we have paid you but $60,000 of the kind of money which you left with me, but I have handed you a promise to pay something in the indefinite future and that is the full value now.' To us to reason like that, it seems not to reason at all. It is to To us to reason like that, it seems not to reason at all. It is to state the conclusion wihout regard to the difficulties which one encounters in reasoning.

THE POWERS OF CONGRESS

"Now, we are told that all this is possible because under the provisions of the Constitution giving to Congress power to coin money and regulate its value, Congress may adopt a monetary system, and then it may put that monetary system into effect and sweep out of court everything that interferes with its consum-

"In the discussion of this matter it is well to observe what the

"In the discussion of this matter it is well to observe what the point at issue is, and not merely by covering up generalities with a multitude of words distract the mind from the point.

"No one denies the power of Congress to adopt the monetary system, but it does not follow that because Congress may adopt the monetary system that it may adopt any monetary system. When it adopts the system, it must adopt a reasonable and a proper one to carry out the purposes for which the power was given to it.

"What was that purpose? It was to fix standards, to permit Congress to provide a circulating medium to the public. It was not intended to enable Congress under the guise of law to repudiate. It was intended to give Congress the power to meet its honest obligations, and what was the effort in the Legal Tender cases. But here we have a monetary system—the intent, I almost said the here we have a monetary system—the intent, I almost said the wickedness, of which is almost beyond comprehension—what is it? This monetary system that supports the country.

"First, we will give to the President power to depreciate the dollar to 50 cents, afterward limited to 60 cents. Next, we will destroy all these private obligations by a statute entitled 'A Statute to Regulate the Currency of the United States.' And we not only destroy these private obligations, but we will destroy the Government's obligations as well, the same language, the same section that covers the one covers the other.

"And so having put out five hundred millions of gold-clause bonds in May, Congress in June says all of these promises to pay in gold are illegal and are contrary to public policy, the policy which has been strictly observed for many, many years, and has been approved by all courts where this exact question has been heaves. before them.

THE 60-CENT DOLLAR

"Having undertaken to destroy these gold clauses, the dollar is depreciated to 60 cents, and the prices of commodities will now be estimated in these deflated dollars and for all parties and all commodities instead of having a dollar we have 60 cents. All commodities instead of having a dollar we have 60 cents. All mortgages upon all railroads, all mortgages upon all buildings, all bank deposits, all insurance funds, everything that a thrifty man has accumulated for his old age is subjected to this depreciation, and we have the unholy question that I speak about.

"We, perhaps, are venturesome enough to say that no such power was ever granted by the framers of our Constitution. It was not there then. And it was not there yesterday; it is not there today. REPORT OF POLICY COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL PUBLIC HOUSING CONFERENCE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very brief Report of the Policy Committee of the National Public Housing Conference.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPROVAL BY THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE OF THE REPORT ON SLUM CLEARANCE AND REHOUSING, JANUARY 20, 1935

CLEARANCE AND REHOUSING, JANUARY 20, 1935

The clear statement of purpose in the matter of slum clearance, included in the President's recent message to Congress, makes him the Nation's leader in this important field of social pioneering. To those assembled at the Second Washington Conference on Slum Clearance and Rehousing, the President's espousal of public housing, for the promotion of which this organization exists, is welcome indeed. His recognition of the great social evil of the slum gives us cause to hope that the program now directed toward its abolition may be continued and enlarged until the sought-for goal is attained. In a previous message to the National Housing Conference the President has stated that the beginnings made by the Housing Division of the Public Works Administration is slum clearance "may be regarded as no more than the first steps in a great and permanent campaign against those appalling slum conditions in which a third of our population is now forced to exist." To cope with a problem of such magnitude—involving, as it is estimated 5,000,000 families—this conference recommends that the following steps be taken with the greatest possible dispatch:

First, that the $880,000,000 balance unexpended by the Public Works Administration and not otherwise allocated be made available immediately to the Housing Division to permit further con-able immediately to the Housing Division to permit further construction of rehousing projects and for the imperatively necessary extension of the work of the Housing Division; also, that a major portion of the $4,000,000,000 fund for public works be appropriated for public housing and that current Government activity in the field of public housing be expanded as rapidly as is compatible field of public housing be expanded as rapidly as is compatible with efficiency. We recommend this action to accelerate the reemployment both of men and materials.

Second, that the program of the Housing Division be decentralized as rapidly as possible to allow an increasing latitude to local authorities which shall be subject only to conformity with standards and methods established by the Housing Division. We believe that this local responsibility, coupled with the weight of Presidential and congressional approval, will act as a spur to those cities still without power to initiate their own programs to secure such power from State legislative bodies.

Third, that Federal legislation be enacted to convert the Housing such power from State legislative bodies.

Third, that Federal legislation be enacted to convert the Housing Division into a permanent and integral part of the Government structure. Recognizing the slum as a continuing problem, overshadowing the future and deeply rooted in the past, we appeal for extension of the Housing Division, so that (a) its work may no longer be limited by purposes of relief, recovery, or by other emergency factors; (b) its procedures may be more expeditious and more clearly defined; and (c) the present financial policy may be strengthened by providing loans at the same rate of interest the Government pays for its money, by the extension of the amortization period, and by a guaranty that the present subsidy of 30 percent of the cost of labor and materials will be continued.

POLITICAL SITUATION IN WASHINGTON-ARTICLE BY FRANK R.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask that an article by Frank R. Kent, published in the Baltimore Sun of February 25, 1935, relative to the political situation in Washington, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of Feb. 25, 1935]

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS By Frank R. Kent

FACTS

Washington, February 25.

Perhaps Mr. Roosevelt, so often described as the "master politician of his time", by some shrewd, bold move may miraculously straighten out the situation that has developed in Washington.

It may be that he can center behind him a public sentiment that will send opposing Senators scurrying for cover. Or, by turning on the full strength of his "personal charm" he may persuade them to "be good." These have so consistently prevailed against the sober judgment of the country in the past 2 years that it is not yet safe to say they may not prove effective. However, it is noe exaggeration to say that as things stand now they are in a mess. For the sake of reality and to preserve a sense of proportion, it seems worth while to look the facts about Mr. Roosevelt in the face. There are signs now that some of them are beginning to sink in. For example, there are the basic facts that after 2 years Mr. Roosevelt has increased the national debt from twenty-two to thirty-three billions; that the accumulated deficit, two billion thirty-three billions; that the accumulated deficit, two billion when he came in, is now nearer eleven; that 20,000,000 people are now living on relief; that there are more men out of work than a year ago; that the strain of the Federal relief and public-works policies has brought most of the cities and States to the verge of policies has brought most of the cities and States to the verge of bankruptcy.

Those are not controversial or partisan statements. They are admitted facts, too obvious to be argued. They are desperately real, but they would not be so appalling if the recovery schemes launched by Mr. Roosevelt were in healthy shape, with promise to pull us out eventually and justify their enormous cost. But they are not. No one contends they are. There is not one—literally not one—of the major experiments which is not sick—so sick that even the average voter could recognize the fact were his attention not diverted by the new and yet more dazzling scheme with which it is proposed to replace them.

Take a look at them—the A. A. A. seething with friction and split by factional strife, with its head, Mr. Wallace, obviously distressed and disheartened, forced to go in a direction he has publicly proclaimed as dangerous. After 2 years of A. A. A. the country for the first time is importing food instead of exporting; the cost of living has mounted for everybody; the farmer still cries for more; and the consumer is just beginning to feel the pinch. Take the N. R. A., a failure, so branded by its originators and sponsors, in a condition of incredible confusion, without a sense of direction, as unenforceable as the Volstead Act, and with neither public nor political support, the chief reason for its continuance being the 7,000 job holders who have established therein a vested interest.

The P. W. A. has been indicted by friends of the new deal as public nor political support, the chief reason for its continuance being the 7,000 job holders who have established therein a vested interest.

The P. W. A. has been indicted by friends of the new deal as "worse than a failure", while Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hopkins alike have declared the Federal relief scheme under which we have been operating is no longer tolerable. The Federal Housing Commission, which was to revive the heavy industries and insure recovery, is in a state of inertia, despite the employment of 17 men in its "public relations" bureau, at a total salary of $79,000, and 12 in its publicity section, with total salaries of $45,900.

Only those who, for some reason, will not face the facts, or who, for some reason, are incapable of taking an unprejudiced view, will deny the above statements. They are true, and every clear-headed man in Washington knows them to be true. Actually, the 1935 program itself is the best evidence of their truth. In it Mr. Roosevelt proposes to continue N. R. A. and A. A. A., despite the condition of both, but to supersede the rest of the new deal by a vast new works-relief program involving $5,000,-000,000, and social-security legislation which will impose on the States various forms of old-age pensions, child pensions, and unemployment insurance—practically all of which are disguised relief plans which will put millions more on the Federal pay rolls.

Both are now hung up in Congress. Before the session began, there was scarcely anyone who did not believe Mr. Roosevelt would get anything he wanted at this session. So far he has gotten nothing. Beaten on the World Court, his works-relief bill has been changed so as to scuttle his plans, his social securities plans have aroused real antagonism, and his N. R. A. appeal is disregarded for an investigation. Somehow or other, Mr. Roosevelt must get through his works-relief bill, if he is to have any program this year. Without it, he is thrown back on measures he has already indicated as inadequate. Probably a way to save this bi even for an anesthetized public, both as to power and as to money. In brief, as one Senator described it, "The people are beginning to realize that if we don't stop somewhere this man will pull us all over the brink."

ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a most interesting article from the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, written by W. W. Brewton, of Atlanta, Ga., concerning the authorship of the first measure providing for the free rural delivery of mails. The author of the article presents many facts to establish that the first legislation for this purpose ever adopted was sponsored by Hon. Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, formerly a distinguished Member of this body, during the time he was serving in the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, Feb. 20, 1935] TOM WATSON AND RURAL FREE DELIVERY

Editor of the Daily News:

I address you this communication respecting the article on the American rural free delivery appearing in your issue for Sunday, January 13, 1935, the caption of which sets forth that Hon. John S. Henderson, of North Carolina, had been termed the father of

The article gives prominent mention also of Thomas E. Watson and John Wanamaker. In view of the great step in human progress instituted by this innovation, I was very glad indeed to see your paper give space to its discussion. It was one of the greatest reforms this country has ever known. With respect to its origin, however, there is no doubt whatever. Many men had for years advocated the free delivery of mail in rural sections,

Thomas E. Watson among the number. Wanamaker, as Postmaster General, had promoted the star-route system, but he did not inaugurate rural free delivery for the simple reason that it required a law to do so. As you, of course, know, the star-route system was the free delivery of mail to small towns and villages off the railroads. That was not rural free delivery, as the author of your article recognizes, nor was it recognized as such by the law, or by Mr. Henderson, of North Carolina, who, as Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for the House in 1893, was in charge of the post-office appropriation bill for that 1893, was in charge of the post-office appropriation bill for that

The American rural free delivery was created by law. There was no other way to create it. It began, consequently, with the first law providing for it. That first law was naturally the first law that appropriated money for it, as there could have been no such thing as creating the system without money. The very first law ever enacted in the history of the United States for rural free delivery of mail was on Pebruary 17, 1893. On that date the House of Representatives of the United States Congress passed an amendment. Introduced by Thomas E. Watson, providing that the sum of $10,000 be taken from the money appropriated for the Post Office Department and used by the Postmaster General in starting rural free delivery of mail; that is to say, free delivery to trural inhigh the country to themse the late named above, you will see that Mn. All cellvery by virtue of being in charge of the bill for the Department to be passed) that if the House adopted Mr. Watson's amendment it would be the first time money had been appropriated for rural delivery, delivery outside cities, towns, and villages. On the date named, the House, sitting as a Committee of the Whole House, agreed to the Watson amendment, which incorporated it in the bill. Now the post-office and post roads for the year, was passed on March $, 1883. The Watson amendment thus became law on that date. The amendment was adopted on Pebruary 17, which merely incorporated it in the bill; but when the bill with all its amendments was passed on March $, 1893. The advocacy of rural free delivery by watson, House in the proper side of the country of course, following in due course as the record of laws passed shows. AN AMERICAN FIRESIDE—RADIO BROADCAST BY SENATOR WHEELER AND OTHERS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radiobroadcast by Norman Hapgood, Roy Thurman, and myself, delivered on the 3d instant, on the subject of An American Fireside.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN AMERICAN FIRESIDE OPENING ANNOUNCEMENT

An American Fireside! Tonight our fireside host, Norman Hap-good, has invited as his guest Senator Burron K. Wheeler, the distinguished United States Senator from Montana and Chairman of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. Hapgood has just greeted Senator WHEELER and they are seated at the fireside with Roy Thurman, of the National Home Library Foundation. Mr. Hapgood is speaking:

Mr. Hapgood. Senator WHEELER, we are especially glad to have you with us this evening because in past weeks we have devoted a number of our fireside hours to a discussion of democracy and those principles which make for a country that is freezed and those principles which make for a country that is free and pro-

Mr. Thurman. Senator, I imagine you and Mr. Hapgood are accustomed to having some pretty hot discussions together.

Senator Wheeler. Yes. We started arguing as soon as we met, in Berlin, some 13 years ago, and we have been at it, off and on, ever since.

Mr. Hargoon. The Senator was headed for Russia, Thurman, when we met in Germany, with the same energy that has marked everything he has ever done; and the same fearlessness. Things everything he has ever done; and the same fearlessness. Things have changed in those two countries, Burt.

Senator Wheeler Yes; they have their tremendous problems, just as we have ours.

Mr. Thurman. You must have been pretty close, Mr. Hapgood, to some of the Senator's activities right here in Washington, also.

Senator Wheeler. Norman and I have been in at least two fights on the same side; and lively fights at that.

Mr. Hapgood. Yes; you know, of course, that Senator Wheeler was a candidate for Vice President on the ticket with the elder La Foliette in 1924; and I ardently supported that ticket. The other fight to which the Senator refers was the great oil scandals, in which he did superb work. At one time we formed a committee, of which I was chairman, to arouse public opinion against the persecution to which Wheeler was subjected by the Department of persecution to which Wheeler was subjected by the Department of

Mr. Thurman. Those must have been lively days for both of you. You speak of arousing public opinion. How did the newspapers behave, Senator? Did they help educate the people to what was behind Fall and Daugherty?

Senator Wheeler. Did they? Not they. At one time Senator Tom Walsh and I were treated by most of the respectable newspapers as if we were public enemies no. 1 and no. 2. Cleaning up a situation where big interests are involved is not usually popular at the beginning. at the beginning.

Mr. HAPGOOD. But now it is recognized that the Senate has no function more useful than the function of investigation. You are You are now chairman of the important Committee on Interstate Com-merce, Burt, and I should like very much to hear you on the Senate as an institution. Don't leave out the sensitive point that Senator Wheeler. That charge has, of course, been repeated many times. The Senate, however, is really an institution greater than any of its Members, and I might almost say greater than the sum of all its Members.

Mr. Thurman. What exactly do you mean, Senator? I should think that most institutions are greater than their individual Senator WHEELER. Yes; but the Senate is the only legislative body of its kind in the world. Never are more than one-third of its number newly elected. Two-thirds of its total number remain a body of some continuity. It has had an uninterrupted existence since 1789, almost 150 years.

Mr. Thurman. There is a quotation in an article in Fortune magazine this month which says of the Senate that it is the greatest deliberative body in the world and preserves a power which neither the senate of Rome nor the senate of the Venetians enjoyed.

Senator Wheeler. That's very true. It not only passes laws and confirms appointments and ratifies treaties, but above all, as Hapgood has just hinted, it is the only body that acts as complainant, good has just hinted, it is the only body that acts as complainant, prosecutor, judge, and jury. It has the power to indict, to impeach, and, above all, to investigate.

Mr. Hargood. The Senate's power to investigate is, in my opinion, highly beneficial to popular government. It serves notice to those in high places in Government that their acts are reviewable, and it has also enabled the public time after time to uncover gross inclusions and over my contractions and over the provider of t violations and even crimes on the part of men in positions of Senator Wheeler, Right you are, Norman. Take away the power of investigation from the Senate, and you deprive the people of a valuable instrument which has in the past, as now in the present, been responsible for legislation remedying abuses and ills in the body politic as well as preventing the recurrence of further injustice tices.

Mr. Thurman. What outstanding investigations would you name, Senator, which through the publicity given them, educated the public and produced a popular demand for beneficial legislation. Senator Wheeler. There have been too many to mention, but the outstanding investigations of the past that come to mind are the Pujo, the Teapot Dome, the Daugherty, and the banking and currency investigations.

Mr. Hapgood. I am glad you included the Pujo investigation. That inquiry was one of the first great steps toward making the country understand that the old trustee conception of banking was dying and that great bankers were becoming mixed up in the kind of business that is a frenzied chase after quick wealth. What you have been doing more recently is part of the same movement. Senator Wheeler. The banking and currency investigation will go down as one of the most beneficial chapters of public service ever performed in the Senate's whole history. Its exposure of how the bankers use other people's money; how they fleeced depositors and investors, ruined industries, and contributed in no small measure to the panic of 1929, led Congress to enact legislation that everybody agrees is of the highest value to the financial health of the Nation.

Mr. Harcoop, I am speaking for myself right now. Burt. and health of the Nation.

Mr. Hapgood. I am speaking for myself right now, Burt, and not for you or anybody else, when I say that what your investigations have uncovered go much further than individual short-comings; further even than the fault of a whole group of powerful men to live up to their traditional responsibilities. They lead to the great question of how much size—which means how much power—can safely pass over to a few big corporations.

Senator Wheeler, I was just about coming to that point.

Mr. Hapgood. Raymond Moley, in his weekly magazine, Today, has coined a pretty expression for this concentration of power. I am going to ask Professor Moley to talk about this subject next Sunday at this fireside. This concentration of power, Moley calls private socialism, and he goes on to say that all the arguments made by big business against state socialism can be turned into arguments against the same vast concentration of power in private hands.

Senator Wheeler. I noticed Moley's issue of February 2 and

WHEELER. I noticed Moley's issue of February 2 and Senator hope he will keep hammering along that line.

Mr. Hapgood. I suppose most of us are disappointed in what regulation has done to check abuses in big business. The difficulty is that regulation must depend on the people in power. When you realize that two Presidents have endeavored to get Eastman off the Interstate Commerce Commission because they thought him too radical, we see how easily the clock may be set Senator Wheeler. However, they failed to get him off.

Mr. Hargood. Yes; but only through the intervention of a powerful individual from Massachusetts, both times.
Mr. Thurman. Who was the individual, and who were the two Presidents?

Mr. Hapgood. Oh, come now, Roy, that is indiscreet. I will tell you secretly. I will say now only that one of the Presidents ought to have known better, and one of them did not know much of anything. However, to get back on the track, if regulation is so insecure a weapon, Burt, how about the taxing power as a sure-insecure a weapon, Burt, now about the taxing power as a surefire method of controlling this private socialism?

Senator Wheeler, More discussion ought to be given to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Cardozo, upholds the right to tax for the purpose of controlling size.

Mr. Thurman. That case bears on the taxation of chain stores, does it not, Senator?

Senator Wheeler. It does; but there is nothing to prevent the does it not, Senator?

Senator Wheeler. It does; but there is nothing to prevent the application of the same principle over a wider field.

Mr. Hargood. In fact, if my sources of information are correct, something along that line will happen this very week.

Senator Wheeler. So you know my bill to tax size is to be introduced in a day or two?

Mr. Hargood. I do; and I look upon the step as a landmark in history. I wish you would explain to Thurman here, who is a good young progressive, just what is in the bill.

Senator Wheeler. With the proper safeguards and exceptions it puts a tax, sharply rising with size, on gross assets of corporations. For example, if the assets are over $1,000,000 and under $5,000,000, the tax is $1 per thousand; then up to $10,000,000 it is $2; and so on up to a size between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000, when it is $10. In the last case, you see, at $10 per thousand, 1 percent of the capital would be taken away in a year.

Mr. Hargood. Another method would be to tax the turnover, instead of the volume of assets. However, I think your plan is better. In the future there will be valuable debating on that and other points, but the main point is that we are now started.

Senator Wheeler. Yes; that is the point, and the purpose is made clearer in the last section, which reads thus:

"Sec. 6. The Federal Trade Commission is authorized and directed to make a study and investigation of the relation, in the various types of business enterprises, of the total resources of a corporation to its efficiency, with a view to determining differences in the desirable maximum size of corporations according to differences in classes of business. The Federal Trade Commission shall report to the Congress on or before January —, 1937, the results of its investigation and study, together with its recommendations."

Mr. Hargood. Gee, that is hot material, Burt. It puts you once more right out in the vanguard of progress. And no matter what

Mr. Hargood. Gee, that is hot material, Burt. It puts you once more right out in the vanguard of progress. And no matter what else is decided to be a necessary part of a new deal, or, on the contrary, a mere experiment to be dropped, this wrestling with the Basic Curse of Bigness (to take the title of the latest book collecting the views of Justice Brandeis) must be kept up.

Senator Wheeler, I do not pretend to know how much support the move will have the move will have.

the move will have.

Mr. Hapgood. If you have in mind the President—

Senator Wheeler. I did not say so.

Mr. Hapgood. I know you didn't. The responsibility is mine.

I am sure the President is 100 percent behind this principle.

What he may be able to do at any moment depends largely on what else is put up to him. If the 57 varieties of wild inflationists get really busy, his whole strength may have to be given to cracking nuts; but if the liberal elements in Congress, and the sensible radicals—I mean those who are radical in purpose but rational in method and timing—if those elements keep the loose sensible radicals—I mean those who are radical in purpose but rational in method and timing—if those elements keep the loose and inexperienced theorists from using up all his strength, I am confident he will have his heart in this purpose of yours. Anybody of sense, whether in his political circle or not, knows he, like Wilson before him, wishes to bring about great democratic changes by expert methods. One of my mottoes is that hell is paved with good intentions.

Senator Wheeler All right, Norman, that is your speech. If you have finished, I will go on telling why it is necessary, for the sake of freedom, to follow up this war on bigness. We are all familiar with the argument that bigness brings about economy and efficiency. This is true only up to a certain point in size, differing in different businesses, which is one reason for section 6 of my bill, calling for an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission. On the basis of that report we ought to be able to adjust size in various lines to social aims. The most general truth about very big combinations is that after controlling a market they proceed to kill off the little fellow, and after they have done that they go on to all kinds of devices, such as extrastock dividends and holding companies, to make the public pay enough to give a profit on a mass of securities that represent no money invested but merely a trick to cover up avecestica profit. enough to give a profit on a mass of securities that represent no money invested but merely a trick to cover up excessive profit. One other thing should never be left anywhere except in the foreground of discussion, and that is the control of opinion—in newspapers in schools in colleges, that the sweller business units papers, in schools, in colleges—that the swollen business units set out to secure. We have a good way of testing what I have said about the inefficiency of big units. When we begin to tax size, the very efficient big units can pay the tax; the inefficient ones will not and will have to break into smaller ones.

ones will not and will have to break into smaller ones.

Mr. Hapgood. Some of the more efficient ones may see the writing on the wall and act before they have to. For instance, I notice that one of the most successful grocery chains is cutting down the number of stores it owns right now, with an explanation of the advantages of independent smaller units. Now I don't want to spring too many big news stories in one talk, but I notice this: One of the reservations in your bill for taxing size applies to business already under regulation, like the railroads. Of course, the railroad has been a great issue, especially in your part of the country, for about 60 years.

Senator Wherefer I have been preparing a bill for Government.

Senator Wheeler. I have been preparing a bill for Government ownership of all the railroads in the country. When I first came to the Senate I thought that a solution to the perplexing railroad situation was Government ownership. I have learned that Government ownership does not necessarily improve matters, but after an intensive study of the pros and cons, I am convinced today that the Government ownership of railroads is the only way out of the perplexing difficulties facing private ownership and management of this most important of public utilities.

Mr. Thurman. Senator, I can appreciate your cogent arguments for Government ownership and operation of railroads. But wouldn't unification of the railroads with the attendant elimination of duplication that you mentioned as an evil imply the dismissal of thousands of railroad employees—thus adding to our unemployment problems?

Senator Wheeler. Possibly, but only temporarily, if at all. we unified the roads and improved and modernized the service and cut out the huge waste, the result of a debt-ridden carrier system, the railroads of the country would be used more, rates could be lowered, traffic would tend to increase, and steady employment be assured. The situation now facing both skilled and traffic would realroad worker is a well in tracellite to the structure. unskilled railroad workers is awful in instability and insecurity alone. Let me not neglect to add that the return of a normal or increased traffic, which would inevitably follow the governmental operation, would provide a needed stimulus to the Nation's basic industries.

Mr. Hapgood. No doubt you have read Coordinator Eastman's latest report?

Senator WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. Hapgood. It is long, but some general views stand out. He thinks it is absurd to manage railroads separately from other methods of transportation, such as water, busses, and air. Short of that big unification he favors consolidation of the railroads themselves

Senator Wheeler. I agree, of course, with much, or most, of what Mr. Eastman says. As to the busses, I do not wish them handicapped, merely to help the railroads, and I do not believe he does. They represent progress, and the public should have the benefit of that progress. Another point is that I do not think the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms suggested by Eastman, such as the needed amount of the reforms are referred out under private ownership, here unification, will ever be carried out under private ownership, be-cause the vested interests, in the railroad officials themselves, and in the financial manipulators, will be strong enough to prevent the reforms.

Mr. Hargood. Many people suspect that Eastman agrees with you. And I am glad you put weight on the other evil we may run into; the evil of putting more and more power into the hands of whatever groups of men happen to be running the Government at the moment. Every time you turn over to the Government a new function you put into its hands a new weapon of influence, or coercion, through the use of what we politely call patronage, and Grover Cleveland might have called plunder. Of course, just now, with people uncomfortable, and mortgaging the future, through the National Government's going into debt, there is more desire to dump everything on the central Government, than there will be when we begin to feel the taxes.

Senator Wheeler I appreciate all that. The law, or the system, is often less important than the administration of the law or the system.

Mr. HAPGOOD. Exactly, as Pope has it:

"For forms of law let fools contest. Whate'er is best administered is best."

Whate'er is best administered is best."

Senator Wheeler. That does express the principle, and, of course, a poet has the right to exaggerate. It is true that when we turn the railroads, or any other big utility, over to the Government we are up against the question of administration without a sufficiently expert and independent civil-service system.

Mr. Hapgood. Of Government ownership, Eastman says it offers the greatest advantages, and also the greatest dangers. He believes so great a change ought not to be taken without submission to the public, and many of us do not believe the public yet favors it. Senator Wheeler. I agree that it should first meet with definite public expression of approval. Also I agree that today the public Senator Wheeler. I agree that it should first meet with definite public expression of approval. Also I agree that today the public would not approve; I think it will approve as soon as it fully understands what has been done to the railroads by the manipulators. For example, since the panic of 1929 it has been necessary for the Federal Government to lend huge sums of money to the railroads in order that they might continue to pay interest on their bonds and to maintain their service. It is my belief that much of these huge sums will never be recovered by the Government. I further believe that the present plight of the railroads has not been caused so much by mismanagement of executives and managers as by the manipulation of railroad funds and securities owned by bankers and stock promoters. I believe also that if private ownership of railroads is allowed to continue many roads will collapse and bring down with them insurance companies and other institutions which have heavy investments in them. them.

Mr. Hapgood. Certainly the attitude of the public will be determined by how fully it is informed. When the whole story is understood the control of opinion by big units will be more easily seen and stopped. Since the railroads have been regulated their control of opinion has been lessened. They are not today in the same category as other utilities that do control or attempt to control public opinion. control public opinion.

Senator Wheeler. That is true. Take the approaching fight over holding companies. That is imminent. And how simple it is, when you come down to it. In the whole fight against size there is nothing so simple. Because—and note this—to tax holding companies, what do you do? You do nothing whatever except take away an exemption. That ought to be pounded in, over and over, in reply to any propaganda that goes out on the other side.

Mr. Hapgood. The big propaganda will be what it always is—the innocent purchasers, widows and orphans. I must look it up, because I am trusting my memory, but I am pretty sure that once, while he was at Albany, Al Smith made a statement to the effect that you cannot have progress without casualties. I may add on my own account that they are usually casualties of past evils. What bothers me more is what you said a minute ago about government at Washington and our lack of preparation. That, forernment at Washington and our lack of preparation. That, for-tunately, does not apply to taxation of size, but it does apply to tunately, does not apply to taxation of size, but it does apply to a large part of the reforms that lie ahead of us.

Senator WHEELER. As a Nation we can progress only insofar as we develop an enlightened and informed citizenry. On my last trip to England I found that the average London policeman knew more about public affairs and government and the international situation than the average business man or lawyer in America. You know, Norman, while I am sometimes accused of blaming all of our economic ills upon the rich, that is not correct. I have repeatedly told the people of my State that they get, and the people of this Nation get, exactly the kind of government they deserve—no better and no worse. We are all very apt to blame the rich and those in high places for all the ills which the human flesh is heir to, as well as all of our economic ills, for the drought in Montana and for the halitosis among the Negroes in the South.

the listeners, the thousands who are coming to look to us for guidance, how they can go along preparing themselves for grappling with the future. Have you learned most of your lessons from life-experience, Burt, like Al Smith, or have you been a good pling with the transfer from life-experience, Burt, like Al Smith, or have you been a good deal of a reader?

Senator Wheeler. It has been mostly experience with me, Norman, and thinking about experience; and, of course, reading what goes with law, a vast field, and whatever I could get to help me in the fields of finance, economics, and industry. But you know, old man, I have six children, and, of course, with their varied tastes, other lines of books are buzzing about in the family.

Mr. Hargood. Sure enough, my children are giving me a lot of education, too. We must get after that subject some time. For my part, I am a violent enthusiast on the rising generation. Thanks for your help, Burt. And the best of luck to you in the crusades ahead of you. The banner of freedom, as Byron said, is torn and bleeding, but streaming ever against the wind. You don't mind that. Thanks again.

INTEREST-BEARING DEBTS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I present a radio address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler] over a national broadcasting network on Saturday afternoon, February 16, which I ask may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am going to talk to you today, not about the price of wheat or corn or cotton or the allotment plan, but about a matter which vitally affects every American, and particularly the farmer. The fundamental sore spot in this depression is the burden of debt which is crushing down all our efforts to increase the national wealth and the flow of commerce. As long as there is a charge of from 5 to 10 percent interest on every issuance of credit, we can no more stabilize prosperous times than we can raise ourselves by our bootstraps.

One of the causes of this burden of debt and interest is overcapitalization of our big industries. How does this affect the farmer? Let me show you. We will say that there are 10 shoe factories, each one of which has been built from scratch by one man factories, each one of which has been built from scratch by one man over a period of a number of years. Each one has a reputation for workmanship and quality and has an established market, each making money. Along comes Mr. Promoter. He sees 10 fairly prosperous small shoe factories, and an idea is born. If the 10 factories can make money separately, think of the profits that could be gouged if they could be combined into one. The idea soon becomes a corporation. The 10 factories are bought up for a million dollars by the promoter with the bankers' money and are sold to the new corporation for $2,000,000. The added million dollars is explained as being the value of one combined management for the 10 factories, and it goes to the promoter and the banker for the idea. Thus the new merger has to earn profits on $2,000,000 when, as a matter of fact, it is only worth one million. It has to have a president at $50,000 or more a year, and about six vice presidents at $10,000 a year. The men who pay for it all are the producers of raw materials and the consumer. He has to give enough for his shoes to pay interest and dividends on stock which is half water. When the corporation starts to go broke it issues gilt-edged double shoes to pay interest and dividends on stock which is half water. When the corporation starts to go broke it issues gilt-edged double A bonds or sells new issues of stocks calling for still further interest burdens on the consumer. It will keep on issuing stocks and bonds until it cannot find another widow or orphan to buy them. It is the story of the power companies and all the holding companies. There are countless receivership records and bankruptcy cases which will bear me out. Of the 35 most notable mergers effected before 1903, 23 of them failed to make as much for the 10 years after merger as did their constituent companies before the merger. The main reason was the incurrence of heavier interest and dividend burdens through watered stock.

and dividend burdens through watered stock.

In order to maintain their rotted financial structures they must deserve—no better and no worse. We are all very apt to blame the rich and those in high places for all the ills which the human flesh is heir to, as well as all of our economic ills, for the drought in Montana and for the haltosis among the Negroes in the South. But that Isn't fair. Every man and woman in the United States has some responsibility for the economic condition, for the panic of 1929, and for the conditions in which we find ourselves today. It do blame the rich and powerful and those in high places, however, because they were in a position where they should have led, and they did not do so. Instead, they unloaded upon the people of this country the watered stocks and bonds. They urged and encouraged the gambling, and the big bankers unloaded upon the little bankers their European and their South American worthless bonds. If this country is to be saved from the fate of every other civilization, they must use the intelligence which the good Lord has endowed them with.

Mr. Harcood. We need that lesson, and a lot of my virtuous friends were trading on margins in 1929. But what about that policeman in London who knew so much?

Senator Wherelers. England, as a country, of course, has always elegended for its very life on foreign trade, and this fact has led to the necessity, felt by all her citizens, of intensively studying public questions. People understand what they have to understand. Our people, it is hardly necessary to say, are not less intelligent than the British. The point is, they have had a virgin continent to develop, and have given their thought to the marvelous possibilities of that development. When it is necessary to understand a question they will understand it.

Mr. Hargood. Good! That is the sound democratic faith. Every week, at this fireside, we try not to stop before we have told.

States in this amount because they issue money for the Government. Yet the Constitution of the United States expressly guards the people against this very thing when it provides that the Congress shall issue money and regulate the value thereof. In the face of this express provision we see the Government borrowing money which the bankers have created out of nothing, and paying the bankers dividends in the form of interest besides. The bankers lend money to the Government, and our so-called "financial leaders" beam with approval. But when there is a whisper of protest and a suggestion that the Government exercise its power in the Constitution and issue its own money, there is a flood of propaganda and long, loud walls of "baloney" dollars, flat money, greenbacks, printing-press money, and other catchwords.

But wait, where did this thirty billion lent to the Government come from? Was it cash? Certainly not, there is nowhere near that amount of cash in circulation today. There are only between five and six billion dollars of actual currency in circulation. Of that amount a billion dollars is carried around in the pockets of the people. The bankers cannot lend this to the Government. A billion of it is in the cash registers and tills of merchants. The bankers cannot lend this to the Government. A billion of it is in the banks, but must be used in over-the-counter transactions, and cannot be lent out. This leaves only between two and three billions in circulation. Where, then, did all this banker money come from to finance 30 billions of Government bond issues? It is credit money, and can be inflated and blown up like a balloon. It is the kind of money the bankers claimed for deposits in 1929, nearly 60 billions of it, created out of watered stocks and bonds and false values. There is your "baloney" dollar, your flat money, and this is what the people pay $7 a head for every year in interest. Sixty billions of credit inflation, the greatest inflation this country had ever known. This was cheap money. The other day the House of Representatives passed a measure calling for expenditure of $4,830,000,000 for the coming year for public works. If the bill passes the Senate and is signed by the President, the money will be raised by selling bonds. It will cost the people of the United States over a hundred million dollars a year to use this banker-made money. I have introduced an amendment to this bill which will provide for the issuance of non-interest-bearing United States notes instead of bonds, with provision for retiring them from circulation at the rate of 4 percent a year. If this amendment is adopted, it will save the people a hundred million dollars annually and will be no more flat money than that which we would get from the bankers. There would be the same thing back of both the bonds and the notes—that is, the c becomes purchasing power. When the banks inflate credit, the profit never steps down into the hands of the people, but rather goes to swell incomes in the higher brackets.

The alarmists will point to Germany's mark, Russia's ruble, the French franc, but there is no parallel. The bankers could throw us into the same situation that faced these Governments if this Government did not issue another dollar. The bankers inflated their credit from nothing to ten billion, to twenty, then on to fifty, and to nearly sixty billion dollars in 1929—then when deflation was the order of the day this ephemeral bankers' counterfeit money dropped by ten millions, then twenty, then finally down to $28,000,000,000. I say to you that no one group of private citizens, motivated solely by a desire for profits, should be able to so completely control the destinies of a hundred and twenty million American sovereigns. There is only one possible cure for it, and that is for the Government to control its own credit and place it in the hands of the people in the form of purchasing power. If that policy is not embarked upon now voluntarily, it will be forced upon us later, and the process of forcing it upon us is liable to be attended by many hardships and much suffering. A few days ago an issue was raised in the United States Senate which bore upon this problem. I introduced an amendment to the Farm Loan Act calling for a reduction in the interest rate on loans through the Farm Credit Administration from 4½ percent to 3½ percent. There was strong opposition to the amendment, and the debate lasted several days. We were finally able to pass the amendment by a vote of 43 to 39, and I am in hopes that it will be adopted in the House of Representatives and signed by the President. If it is, it will mean a saving on an average of $63 a year to 395,000 farm families who have borrowed from the Farm Credit Administration.

This is just a start. Figures have been published showing that

This is just a start. Figures have been published showing that at the present time there are outstanding $281,000,000,000 of long-term, interest-bearing debt in this country. The interest on this staggering sum—interest which must be paid—amounts to more than double the income of all the farmers. This is the rent we pay the money lenders, and it is a rent which we must abolish if we are ever to build a permanent prosperity.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORTS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be given leave to submit reports during the recess or adjournment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may not have any objection, but I do not understand the purport of the request.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall make a further statement in explanation of the request.

There is practically no business on the Calendar of the Senate, as the Senator from Oregon understands. Just a day or two ago we proceeded with the calendar, both for the consideration of unobjected bills and for the consideration of bills under rule VIII. It is probable that at the conclusion of today's business I shall ask that the Senate adjourn or recess until next Monday, in order that the committees of the Senate, practically all of which are very busy, may have an opportunity to carry on their labors.

I am informed that the Committee on Appropriations probably will report a general appropriation bill tomorrow. I did not deem it necessary to have a session of the Senate for that purpose, and thought that by the arrangement which has been asked the committee could submit its report during the recess or adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is the proposal now made by the Senator limited to appropriation bills?

Mr. ROBINSON. It was not so limited; no.

Mr. McNARY. What I had particularly in mind was that, as everyone realizes, in a way this proposal abrogates a standing rule of the Senate; namely, that when the report of a committee is made it must lie over until the succeeding day.

I have no objection to the proposed agreement if it appertains to appropriation bills only, but assuming that the relief joint resolution should come in under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, on the very day we reconvene, whether it be on Friday or Saturday or Monday, that measure would come up automatically, whereas I should want it to lie over in order that Senators might have an opportunity to read the hearings and discuss the problem fully among themselves and with those who are interested in the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. I may say to the Senator that I have no information that the Committee on Appropriations will be ready to report the work-relief joint resolution prior to the end of the present week. If it should do so, however, and the joint resolution should be reached by the Senate for consideration, I should not insist upon taking it up on the first day of next week. I should be very glad to concede that the joint resolution should go over at least for a day if the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator should request that such course be taken.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that the request of the Senator from Arkansas has reference to the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. That was the question I was asking.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had in mind a general appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. I think the matter can be simplified by having the agreement apply only to general supply bills. I desire to see expedition employed in the disposal of the relief measure, but I still insist that we should have an opportunity to consider it before we are forced to its discussion or to a vote upon it. So if the Senator will modify his request, and limit it to supply bills, I shall have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations have leave to report, during the recess or adjournment of the Senate, any general appropriation bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would it accomplish the Senator's purpose if he should confine his unanimous-consent request to the particular recess to be taken today, rather than making it a general rule for the whole session?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was my intention.

Mr. McNARY. I understood that it applied only to the particular week-end recess which I understand is to be taken today.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The morning business is closed.

ADMINISTRATION OF CODES UNDER THE N. R. A.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. A few moments ago the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] desisted, at the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], from making a statement concerning an amendment proposed by him. The Chair feels, therefore, that he should recognize the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that the resolution which the Senator from Mississippi has in mind relates to the proposed investigation of the N. R. A.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that it is my intention to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will yield to me so that I may make a motion on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been suggested that if the Senator from North Carolina is willing to permit the resolution to which the Senator from Mississippi refers to be brought before the Senate in a formal way, the Senator from North Carolina may then address the Senate on whatever subject he desires.

Mr. HARRISON. I inquire of the Senator if it would be agreeable to him to permit a motion for that purpose to be made, and then proceed with his speech.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 79.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, Senate Resolution 79, submitted by Mr. Nye and Mr. McCarran on the 14th instant, for an investigation of certain charges concerning the administration of industrial codes by the National Recovery Administration, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask for the adoption of an amendment unanimously recommended by the Finance Committee. On page 5, lines 6 and 7, I move that the words "or any subcommittee thereof" be stricken from the resolution, so that the whole Committee on Finance will make the investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I inquire of the Senator what is intended to be done concerning the suggestion which was made in the committee of the possibility of combining the resolution which is now pending and the one offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King]?

Mr. HARRISON. Under the parliamentary status, the only way in which that could be done would be by an amendment which might be offered embodying the two propositions. which I did not intend to propose. I was anxious to get this part of the resolution out of the way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I should like to say that it seems to me a very unusual procedure for the Senate to authorize two investigations into the same subject, to be conducted simultaneously-

Mr. ROBINSON. By different committees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. By different committees, and that it will inevitably lead to confusion. I should like to suggest that the same objectives may be achieved by simply authorizing or directing the Finance Committee to inquire into the same subject matter whch is covered by the resolution of the Senator from Utah

I make that suggestion for the reason that, as all Senators know, the Finance Committee must give consideration during this session to legislation intended to extend, and perhaps to amend, the original N. I. R. A. It seems to me that the logical procedure would be to have one investigation, to have it conducted by the committee which will have jurisdiction over the legislation, and thus to avoid the confusion which I believe inevitably will result from having two committees conducting investigations into the same subject.

I should like also to suggest that the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] is a member of the Finance Committee; and I do not think I am violating any confidence of the meeting of the Finance Committee when I say that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison], the chairman of the committee. suggested that if the procedure I have indicated should be adopted, he would be very glad to invite the Senators who are particularly interested in the subject but who are not members of the Finance Committee to sit in with the committee in the conduct of the investigation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Manifestly, we cannot dispose of this matter hastily. It seems to me the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] ought to be permitted to proceed, and then we may discuss this matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well: that is satisfactory to me.

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, as I undertook to state a moment ago, I am thoroughly of the opinion that every single Member of this great body is desirous of maintaining the standard of living of the workers of the United States of America. I make that statement unhesitatingly, knowing that while those who sit beyond the center aisle are members of an opposing political party, they are human and they are interested in the great producers, the workers of this country, as are we on this side of the aisle.

No country ever had a leader who was more humane or more thoroughly interested in the toilers of his country than our own beloved President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. Knowing that not only our great leader but every man affiliated with the present administration is interested in the solution of the problems of this trying time, I take this opportunity to give expression to my thoughts in reference to the subject which has been brought to the attention of every Member of this body by way of the McCarran amendment to the publicworks joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield. Mr. CONNALLY. I have been very much interested in hearing the Senator's proposed amendment read to the Senate. From a parliamentary standpoint, however, I do not see how the Senator's amendment can possibly be considered until the action of the Senate in adopting the McCarran amendment shall be reconsidered. The Senator is not prepared to move for a reconsideration of the vote now, is he?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; I am not. Mr. CONNALLY. How is the Senator to get his amendment before the Senate? How can we consider it, unless the action of the Senate with regard to the adoption of the McCarran amendment shall be reconsidered?

of the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations automatically undo whatever the Senate did with respect to the McCarran amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not so sure about that. I consulted a parliamentary authority here this morning, and he took the view that when the joint resolution went back to the committee it went back in the form in which it existed at the time. Of course, the committee could report back a recommendation that the McCarran amendment be rejected. I am not a parliamentary authority, and I am not prepared

Mr. BARKLEY. I know that a few days ago we sent back to the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill to which an amendment had been attached, and when the bill came back into the Senate it was considered de novo and as if it had not been previously reported.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope that is the practice.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think undoubtedly that is the rule, and I think that has been the unbroken precedent of the Senate. Of course, the joint resolution is not before the Senate. I do not understand that the Senator from North Carolina is offering an amendment. He has had the proposed amendment read as the basis for some remarks he is making.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator from Arkansas is entirely correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for giving me opportunity to interrupt him. I quite agree with the Senator that the matter ought to be thoroughly considered, and I was wondering how we can attain the end of voting on the Senator's amendment unless we have an opportunity here in the Senate to again consider the whole subject.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the McCarran amendment to the public-works joint resolution makes it mandatory upon the Government to pay to the workers who are taken from the relief rolls, and who are given employment upon public-works projects in this country, opportunity to enjoy the wage scales prevailing in the various and sundry sections of this country.

The chief argument offered against the McCarran amendment, for which amendment I voted, for which I have no apologies to make, and for which amendment I would unhesitatingly vote again were it to come before us in the same form, is that the payment of the prevailing wage scale throughout this country would, it is said, unquestionably interfere with industry.

Mr. President, I am not in accord with that argument. Were I in accord with the argument, and the presentations made by various and sundry men in this body, my attitude no doubt would have been different, because I, like other Members of this body, am desirous of aiding industry, as we all know that good times will not return, that prosperity will not come back, until the opportunity is found to place at work, to give remunerative employment to, the toilers, the workers, the builders of America.

In making that remark I wish to say that I, and all other fair-minded individuals, recognize the fact that labor is just as dependent upon industry as industry is dependent upon labor. We all know that we cannot possibly have a return of the good days of the past until industry has been given a helping hand and lifted to the level of former days.

None of us is desirous of hampering industry. None of us is desirous of doing one single thing that may be construed as a hindrance to the advance of industry and, therefore, the return of prosperity.

Mr. President, I stand here saying to the Members of this body that, in my humble opinion, the McCarran amendment will not in any sense hamper industry in this country. But those who are not in accord with the views we have expressed on this floor, by word of mouth, and likewise by vote, say that paying the prevailing wage in the various sections throughout the United States will hamper industry through the Government giving employment to the laborers

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does not the recommittal of the land who otherwise would be absorbed by industry. Let us see about that.

I have had read a provision which I hope will be considered by the committee to which it should be referred. That provision meets every single argument that has been presented by anyone upon this floor in the particular to which I have referred. It is said that if the toilers, the laborers of this land, are paid the prevailing wage, the great masses of the country who are unemployed will flock to Government work and thereby hinder and hamper and delay the return of recovery, because they will work for the Government rather than work for private industry.

Very well. Granting, for the time being, for the sake of the argument, that that assertion and that those statements be true, I bring now to the attention of Senators the proposed amendment to the McCarran amendment, calling for the payment of the prevailing wage initially throughout the country, but with the proviso that if at any time it should be found that paying the prevailing wage scale is hampering, injuring, interfering with, or delaying the recovery of industry, all that our great leader has to do is to give notification to the effect that it is hampering and injuring industry and recovery, and in that community or in those communities the prevailing wage scale need not be paid.

Mr. President, it has been said that labor is unreasonable. Some have gone so far as to say that the laborers, the toilers of this country, are overpaid. I stand here unblushingly and unhesitatingly state to this body that I do not believe the laborers, the workers of this country, have ever been overpaid, and I thank our great Heavenly Father above that the toilers, the laborers, the workers of this country, who are the producers of all our wealth, in the social life of this world stand many stages above, many stages removed from the unfortunate laborers of the rest of the world.

Mr. President, I voted for the McCarran amendment because I felt that I was voting for a living wage for the workers of this country. I voted for the McCarran amendment because I believed that requiring the prevailing wage scale to be paid to the toilers and the workers of America would not be detrimental to the recovery of industry. However, if, as is said, the adoption of the McCarran amendment will hamper the return of prosperity because it will result in delaying the recovery of industry, my amendment to the McCarran amendment, if it shall be accepted, will unquestionably meet every single argument advanced by those who have opposed us by speech and by vote.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Reference has been made to the high level of wages in this country. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not his experience, and if it is not the experience of those who have investigated the matter, that labor in the United States is more efficient than in any other country in the world, and that, as a matter of fact, the laborers of this country turn out goods in almost every industry at a lower cost per unit than they do in any other country of the world?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have the impression that what the Senator has said by way of the inquiry he has directed to me is unquestionably true and correct. Pursuing that thought, I say to the able Senator from Montana that the laborers, the workers of America, are without peer in any corner of this hemisphere. I believe that a living wage should be given to the producers of this country.

Mr. President, while I have the opportunity, I desire to state, so that none may be in doubt as to my position, that I have always felt that labor heretofore has not received its fair portion of the wealth produced by it in this country; and I am fortunate to be able to look upon a noble leader from the great State of Alabama [Mr. Black], who for years upon years has given expression to the same thought and made the same statement, not only within this Chamber but likewise in every section of the country and in every single one of the sixty-odd counties of the great Commonwealth which he

Mr. President, judging from some of the letters and telegrams I have received from my State of North Carolina, I am thoroughly convinced of the fact that the McCarran! amendment is grossly misunderstood. A great many people are of the belief and are of the impression that should the McCarran amendment be adopted, laborers and mechanics will make hundreds upon hundreds of dollars per month. Such is not my understanding of the amendment, Mr. President. My understanding is that a certain amount has been calculated upon, an average has been taken, which has been set at $50 a month, an amount which it has been considered would be sufficient to feed a man and his wife and his children. This average of $50 a month has been struck. It is my understanding, Mr. President, that if the McCarran amendment should be finally adopted, a man making $5 a day would be given approximately 10 days' work in the month, making a total of $50, the average which has been approximated and struck. Then thereafter during the remainder of the month, if he so pleased, he might seek employment with private industry.

Mr. President, so misunderstood is the McCarran amendment that some of its opponents are going to such lengths as to say that if it should be finally adopted, it would result in killing all the public-works projects in the United States. I wish to say, Mr. President, that if all the public-works projects in the United States are killed, they will not be killed by any vote of mine. I stand here now saying to the Members of this great body that I am 100 percent in accord with the President's idea to create, by way of appropriation, a great public-works fund; and I say now that I shall-and with pleasure—support the measure offered by the President of the United States calling for an appropriation of $4,880,-000.000. I do not think the amount is too small. I think the President's ideas about it are exactly right. If it comes to the point where we need more money to bring about a return of prosperity in this country, Mr. President, I shall vote for $2,000,000,000 more on top of the $4,000,000,000.

Mr. President, why not accept the amendment which I propose to the McCarran amendment? It will meet every argument, it will answer every censure made by those who oppose the McCarran amendment, because in that opposition one of the prime things asserted is that if we make it mandatory upon the Government to pay the laborers, the toilers of the country, the wage scale prevalent in every section and subdivision of the United States it will be detrimental to industry because of taking the laborers from industry and giving them to the Government. Granting that to be true, as I said a moment ago, that argument is met by the amendment I propose to the McCarran amendment. None of us wants to hamper or halt, none of us wants to discourage industry, because we know that labor is dependent upon industry; and labor knows it because labor is reasonable.

Mr. President, let us accept my amendment; and if those in authority ascertain that the payment of the prevailing wage scale in any section of the United States is detrimental to industry by way of the Government absorbing labor, all the President will have to do is to give notice to the effect that such prevailing wage scale is detrimental.

For those who did not hear my proposed amendment read, I desire to read it again:

Provided, however, That the President is hereby authorized to examine the facts and determine whether the payment of such prevailing wage in any locality is subversive of the maintenance or recovery of private industry or otherwise detrimental thereto; and in the event that the President finds that the payment of and in the event that the President finds that the payment of such prevailing wage is so subversive or detrimental, and shall issue a proclamation so declaring, then within 10 days thereafter he shall be and is authorized to direct the payment of such scale of wages in such locality as he shall determine.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe the publicworks bill will pass the Senate in substantially the same form as it was originally reported to the Senate; that is to say, it will not contain the McCarran amendment.

I have been in the two Houses of Congress 24 years, 6 in the House and 18 in the Senate. During that time the Congress has passed scores, indeed, if my recollection is correct, more than a hundred important labor bills. Most of these measures for the advancement of labor I have approved, I have worked for, and supported. I have supported labor when it only had a few friends. I have supported it when it had many friends.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. Mr. REYNOLDS. I desire respectfully to suggest that the measure be reported back to the Senate with my provision contained in it. I merely wish to make that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator interrupt me a little later and have the interruption come at the end of my remarks? I will be obliged to him if he will do that.

Almost uniformly during that entire period I have supported labor legislation, because I honestly believe in protecting the rights of the man who toils and labors. I take great pride in the record I have made concerning labor, and I believe that labor in America has accomplished more, has developed and advanced more during those 24 years than during all its previous history.

Now, coming to the so-called "McCarran amendment" let me say that, if the McCarran amendment were adopted, I believe it would have a tendency in my State and in all other States to cause perhaps hundreds of thousands of men and women who labor in private industry to leave those places in private industry and secure Government employment under House Joint Resolution 117. Such a condition would not be good for the country and it would not be good for labor.

What the administration is undertaking by the joint resolution is to do away with the dole and give men and women who are now on the dole, as well as other unemployed, employment on public projects. To fix the rate of pay so high and make it so attractive as to cause people who now have employment to seek places on the Government pay roll would be destructive of the purposes of the measure.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I will yield to him in a few moments.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well. Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, we all knew when we provided for it that the dole was a temporary expedient and was adopted only as a last resort. No government can see its citizens, men, women, and children, starve; but every thoughtful person agrees that we must get rid of the dole at the earliest possible moment, and that is what the workrelief measure undertakes to do. If we can do away with the dole and put men and women to work where they will be self-respecting citizens again and not dependents on relief, it will add tremendously to their own well-being and happiness and to the economic recovery of the entire country.

The measure as it was reported to the Senate contained the following direction to the President:

Sec. 6. The President is authorized to fix the rates of wages of all persons compensated out of the funds appropriated by this joint resolution and may fix different rates for various types of work, which rates need not be uniform throughout the United States

In the event the President, or such official or agency of Government as he may select, shall determine after an investigation that the rate of wages paid is affecting adversely or is likely to decrease the prevailing rates of wages paid for any work of a similar nature in any city, town, village, or other civil division of the State in which the work is located, or in the District of Columbia, the President, or the official or agency designated by him, shall-

The provision is not merely permissive; it says the President shall-immediately fix the rate of wages at an amount not less than the prevailing rate of wages paid for work of a similar nature in such locality.

As a friend of labor, I should greatly prefer this amendment reported by the committee to the so-called "McCarran amendment." If the administration of the measure were to amendment." be reposed in the hands of a President opposed to labor, there might be something in the contention of the proponents of the McCarran amendment; but such is not the case.

From my own personal knowledge, President Roosevelt is vastly more favorable to labor than have been any of his predecessors, and he has done more for labor than probably all his predecessors combined. That is the record of our President with regard to labor.

Mr. President, as indicative of how sympathetic the present administration has been with the cause of labor, I submit a list of measures passed by Congress during the last session with reference to labor, all of which, I understand, had the cordial support of the administration and a majority of the Congress.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Wagner National Employment System Act. The Roads Employment Act. Insurance Company Loan Act. The Kick-Back Racket Act.
Labor Disputes Joint Resolution. Dill-Crosser Rallway Labor Act. Emergency Rallroad Transportation Act of 1933. Railroad Retirement Act.

National Industrial Recovery Act.

Civil Works-Emergency Relief Act.

Wagner-Lewis $500,000,000 Emergency Relief Act.

Civilian Conservation Corps Reforestation Relief Act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under these circumstances, it is incomprehensible to me how labor can oppose leaving in the hands of the President the administration of the joint resolution under the terms of the provision just quoted. The President is directed by the measure itself, and it becomes mandatory upon him, to pay the prevailing wage if it be found that the rate of pay provided is affecting adversely the prevailing wage scale. After all that President Roosevelt has done for the cause of labor during the 2 years he has been in office, if the laboring man cannot trust him to administer properly the proposed law, then it cannot trust anyone. This measure, in my judgment, means 10, nay, 50 times as much to the laboring people of this country as it means to all the rest of our citizenship combined. From the standpoint of labor it is the most important measure that has been proposed since I have been a Member of the Congress. There are still 8,000,000, or thereabouts, out of employment. The enactment of the joint resolution would furnish work to 3,500,000 of that number, and in times such as these nothing could be more important to that class of our citizens than to get as many of them back to work as possible. So, in my judgment, it is most essential to the laboring interests of this country that the measure be passed at the earliest practicable moment and for some of their number and some of their friends to attempt to thwart the passage of a great piece of legislation such as this, which is almost entirely in their interest, seems to me to be an impediment which ought not to be thrown in its way.

Ah, Senators, let us not be deceived. This measure is in the interest of labor; it is in the interest of the unemployed; it is in the interest of good citizenship; it is in the interest of doing away with the depression. Let none of us deceive ourselves; do not let us put any further obstacle in the way of the joint resolution, but let it be passed as recommended by the committee; for it means, I repeat, more for the laboring men in this country than any other measure that has ever been brought before the Congress.

I wish to urge my laboring friends who need the work so badly to protest to those who are thwarting the passage of the measure not further to oppose it. I know that this measure is in the interest of the laboring people of my State, and I believe it is in the interest of the laboring people of every other State, and I hope they will speak out in their own best interest.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment I will be through, and I will then yield to the Senator.

I call especially the attention of Senators who are proposing to present another amendment; I call the attention of my handsome and distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. McCarran], the author of the McCarran amendment, to what I am now going to say. As a matter of fact, the provision of the joint resolution as reported is directly in line with the practices of labor in their own organizations. When they have to go on strike, as they sometimes do, the organization affords relief to the men on strike, but it does not pay the unfortunate strikers the full amount of the prevailing wage in the locality. I digress long enough to ask any Senator from any State did he ever hear, when such a crisis has arisen, of a labor organization paying the prevailing wage?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator let me answer the question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will in a moment. Did the Senator from Montana or any other Senator ever hear under such circumstances of paying the prevailing wage so as to keep the men on strike unemployed?

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator let me answer?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the labor organizations never pay the prevailing wage except when they furnish work, but when they furnish work every labor organization in the United States has paid the prevailing wage. When it puts members on a dole, that is not true. We are not asking that when put on a dole they shall be given the prevailing wage. All we are asking is that when it comes to erecting buildings and other structures, when the relief workers are put in competition with private industry, that they be paid the prevailing wage.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator name where a single labor organization in this country has ever paid the prevailing wage to strikers engaged on other work?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, I cannot.
Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have the Senator do it.
Mr. WHEELER. But I can tell the Senator that when they put men on their pay roll to do certain things in the coal strike, when those men were working they were paid the prevailing wage. In Montana when they put men to work, differentiating from when they were giving them a dole, they paid the prevailing wage.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that has ever been done in this country I have never heard of it, and I do not know of it. I do not believe it ever occurred, and I challenge the Senator to give the names of the people and the occasion when it was done.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator asked me to answer a question and will not permit me to answer it. I am saying to the Senator that by going to the files of the United Mine Workers he will find that when work was given to members of the United Mine Workers, when they were put on the pay roll to do certain work, they were paid the prevailing wage. He can find the same thing with reference to the mines in the Northwest. When they put the men to work, differentiating from when they actually gave them a dole, they paid the prevailing wage.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should be very happy if the Senator would furnish the facts and figures about the assertion he

Mr. WHEELER. I am simply saying it, and if the Senator wants to get the facts and figures, all he has to do is to ask John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, or the American Federation of Labor, or any of the other labor organizations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Give us the facts.

Mr. WHEELER. I am giving the facts. Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so.

Mr. President, here is what happens. The labor organization pays enough to keep its members, men and women, free from want, and that is right and proper, and I honor and respect them for it. In doing this, they are entirely within their rights. It is precisely what is being attempted to be done in this crisis in our country. That is exactly what the joint resolution is undertaking to do-to tide over those who are so unfortunate as to be without employment in this unusual depression, until private industry may take up the slack. The measure as reported to the Senate is directly in line with the precedent set by labor itself.

Mr. President, I make these remarks as a friend of labor. I challenge anyone interested in the matter to examine my record of 24 years on the subject of labor. Someone had that record prepared not long ago, and I know whereof I speak. I am not one who is merely at times for them; I have uniformly been for labor, and I say here and now that in voting for the joint resolution as reported by the committee, I never in my life acted more sincerely in the interests of labor.

I honestly believe, Mr. President, that some of our labor friends are standing in the way of the enactment of a law which would benefit labor more than any other measure ever passed by the Congress. I urge my thoughtful friends on the other side not to stand in the way of this splendid labor measure, because I believe, indeed I know, it is a labor measure. Do not be deceived by the thought that it is not a labor measure. The joint resolution is going to give labor employment where they now have none. I do not believe we are justified in opposing the measure on the ground of the McCarran amendment when the measure is so beneficial to the cause of labor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. Mr. REYNOLOS. I wish to say to my good friend the Senator from Tennessee, for whom I have great admiration and a great deal of affection, that I am not opposing the joint resolution. I am for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The trouble is the Senator voted to send it back to the committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am going to vote for it. I will tell the people of America that I am for all the public works that are necessary. I know that in Great Britain they are coming out of the depression, and how? They went off the gold standard and then poured billions upon billions of dollars into their public-works program. I know England is coming out of the depression, because they have over there federal housing acts similar to ours which helped the heavy industries and started things on the upgrade. That is what we have to have in this country.

I am not opposing the joint resolution. I am going to vote for the $4,000,000,000 appropriation and for the $4,880,-000,000. If the President of the United States, our great leader, who is a friend of the people, wants $6,000,000,000, I shall vote for $6,000,000,000, if it will help. If that shall not be sufficient, I will vote for another billion. However, the impression has gone out over the country that those of us on this side and on the other side of the Chamber who voted for the McCarran amendment are trying to kill the measure and that we do not trust the President. That is all poppycock.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is all poppycock, let us get together and vote for the joint resolution as the committee originally reported it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is what I shall do with this exception. If the Senate will adopt my amendment to the McCarran amendment, it will be found that it meets the provisions of the bill. Let us see what the joint resolution provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. I regret the Senator has a proviso attached to his proposal.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It would help us. It is such a proviso as will satisfy everybody. No one could then be criticized. Those who voted for the McCarran amendment are being criticized. Those who voted against it are being criticized. I am being criticized and my good friend the Senator from Tennessee is being criticized because he voted the other way. We do not want any criticism. [Laughter.]

We are not going to straddle any fence. I hate a straddler. I hate a man who stands so that the people cannot tell where he stands. We should stand on one side of the fence or the other, or else take the fence away, and then the people cannot tell where we are standing! [Laughter.] If the Senator will vote for my proviso, he will find that it will take Senators out of the hole, and everybody will be sitting on top of the ground. [Laughter.]

Let us see what the joint resolution provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to yield the floor if the Senator is going to insist on taking that attitude.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from North Carolina let me in my own time ask him a question? Does the Senator really think we should adopt his amendment after the committee have considered and worked over the matter for weeks; indeed, I believe for more than a month, as they had spent much time on it when I returned from the Philippines? After the committee has gone into it so carefully and has brought out a provision directing the President, if the prevailing wage is about to be interfered with in the slightest, to pay the prevailing wage, does not the Senator think he ought to have enough confidence in our President, who is being held up to us by the Senator as our great leader, to leave the matter in the hands of the President?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think he ought to have enough confidence in the President to stand by the joint resolution as reported by the committee?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I will say to my good friend from Tennessee that it is not a question of having confidence or not having confidence in the President. We all have confidence in our great leader. We all have the greatest confidence in

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield so that I may ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from North Carolina is resenting the statements which are going about the country that he and his associates who voted for the McCarran amendment are opposing the passage of the joint resolution, or rather preventing it becoming effective. I should like to ask the Senator if he did not know when he voted for that amendment that he was voting for that which would bring about a veto from the great President whom the Senator admires so greatly? Must be not assume the responsibility and can he escape the responsibility for having voted for the McCarran amendment when he knew that by so doing he was deferring the possibility of the joint resolution being enacted into law and made it impossible for it to operate because the President had said he would veto it in that form?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I answer the Senator from Kentucky by saying no!

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish merely to say that I believe the measure is going to pass substantially as reported by the committee, and I believe it ought to pass substantially in that form. I am for the speedy enactment of the measure. I oppose the McCarran amendment as being wholly unnecessary, and say that, in my judgment, that amendment is the only thing in the way of the speedy passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina rose to ask a question of the Senator from Tennes-The Senator from Tennessee then yielded the floor, see. and the Chair has now recognized the Senator from Ala-

Mr. REYNOLDS. I ask for recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has been recognized.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For how long a time does the Senator wish me to yield to him?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Oh, for about 5 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well; I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, my amendment provides that if the prevailing wage paid in the respective political subdivisions of the country shall be found to be detrimental to the workers and the laborers, then the President shall have the right to issue a proclamation setting aside and wiping out and destroying the prevailing-wage provision in

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President— Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to my good friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to correct a statement the Senator made. He said he was receiving a great deal of criticism from the people of North Carolina about his vote and that I was receiving a great deal of criticism, he had no doubt, from my State about my vote. The Senator is entirely mistaken. Up to this time I have not received a word of criticism from anyone in my State for the vote I cast. I have received approval so far as is indicated by letters and telegrams which have come up to this day. I don't believe I will receive any unless some one from Washington suggests they be sent. I did receive a single letter of disapproval from a gentleman in Pennsylvania, and I wrote him a letter in line with what I have stated here on the floor of the Senate this morning. This is the only criticism I have

The Senator from North Carolina must not include me among those who received criticism because of their votes. I did not make my speech because of any criticism, because I have not received any. Really the letter from Pennsylvania which I just mentioned is the only letter of criticism I have received.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I understood the Senator to say that the letter he received from Pennsylvania was a letter of criticism. I assume that all of us have received such letters.

Mr. President, let us look at this joint resolution for just a moment:

Resolved, etc., That in order to protect and to promote the general welfare, by (1) providing relief from the hardships attributable to widespread unemployment and conditions resulting therefrom, (2) alleviating distress, and (3)-

This measure has been drafted and designed, and it is intended and proposed, to do what? It is proposed for the purpose of-improving living and working conditions.

I ask you, Mr. President, if paying wages such as are proposed by the proponents of this measure as reported from the committee is improving living conditions or wage conditions? It is not.

My good friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has said something about the dole. I desire here and now to make clear my position upon that subject. I am against the dole. I think that giving people a dole, as we have been doing, creates indolence, and does not do any good to anybody or anything, anywhere. Therefore, I am for the public-works joint resolution. I am going to vote for $4,000,000,000, or. if we need it, I will vote for six or seven billion dollars.

My amendment is right in line with the measure itself. I desire to read it.

On page 7, the second paragraph of section 6 is as follows:

In the event the President, or such official or agency of government as he may select, shall determine after an investigation that the rate of wages paid is affecting adversely or is likely to decrease the prevailing rates of wages paid for any work of a similar nature in any city, town, village, or other civil division of the State in which the work is located, or in the District of Columbia, the President, or the official or agency designated by shall immediately fix the rate of wages at an amount not less than the prevailing rate of wages paid for work of a similar nature in such locality.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President— Mr. REYNOLDS. I surrender the floor to the Senator. The Senator was good enough to yield to me. I surrender the floor to the Senator, and in so doing I desire to assure him that I am very grateful and appreciative of his kindness.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, one question involved in understood by Members of the Senate. A correct understanding on that point is highly important, as the subject has been emphasized by various Senators in speeches in the Senate. The question is whether the administration of the McCarran amendment would or would not increase the cost to the Government of carrying out the work-relief program and require an additional appropriation to provide a year's relief work

It has been positively stated by Senators that the McCarran amendment would not increase the cost and that the same results would be obtained by paying the prevailing wage for fewer hours of work. It has been just as positively stated by Senators that the McCarran amendment would greatly increase the cost and much more money would be required to operate for 1 year and there would be much less permanent assets resulting from the expenditure.

While the solution of that question may not be decisive with any Senator in the matter of his action upon the McCarran amendment, nevertheless, it is of great importance that the controversy should be further developed on account of the emphasis given to it by Senators who have voted for and against the McCarran amendment.

Supporters of the McCarran amendment have asserted that the only difference in the two plans-prevailing wage and security wage—is the number of hours a worker may be required to work. They insist that by paying the prevailing wage scale a sufficient number of hours to afford the relief worker the monthly security wage-estimated to average $50—the two plans will be completely harmonized.

They have further asserted that as a result of the combining of the two plans no more money will be needed, and that the cost of the Government will be the same.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me finish my statement first. Then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to correct a statement made by the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not yield now. After I finish will yield to any question the Senator desires to propound.

Mr. President, it is evidently true that if three and onehalf million men are paid the same amount of money for working 65 hours a month that they would be paid for working 130 hours a month, the amount paid as wages would be the same. The question then recurs, Would there be additional cost to the Government, in carrying out the various work projects, from letting the work stand idle all the time except approximately 10 days in the month during which the workers would be paid the prevailing wage scale and earn a month's security wages? It seems clear to me that such a work program would necessarily involve large additional cost. It is contemplated that, wherever practical, the work projects shall be done under contract. It is therefore necessary to look at the problem from the standpoint of the contractors who will bid on the projects.

Under the prevailing wage scale the work hours could be broken down either into a fixed number of hours per week or per month. If the weekly unit were used, the work could proceed 3 hours a day for 5 days, or 6 hours a day for 21/2 days. If the monthly unit were used, the work would proceed for 10 days of 6 hours in the month. These calculations are made upon the assumption that the average prevailing-wage scale will cost per hour about twice as much as the average security-wage scale would cost per hour. That assumption is supported by a statement and calculation furnished the Committee on Appropriation by a representative of the Federal Relief Administration.

When a contractor made his estimates upon a given project he would necessarily take into consideration the fact that his machinery and equipment would not be in use except for 15 hours in a week, or for 101/2 days of 6 hours in a month. the McCarran amendment seems to be very differently He would also have to take into consideration the fact that his superintendent and foreman and his office force and other necessary personnel in his organization were working on the project for only a total of 101/2 days of 6 hours in each month. In short, his personnel organization and his equipment and machinery must be used for an entire year while actually employed only about 60 hours in each month

While it is practically impossible for one not thoroughly acquainted with the cost of construction to make any accurate figures, the fact stands without any serious dispute that every contractor would be obliged to include in his bid a very substantial amount to cover his stand-by relations to the project for probably more than twice the time that would be required under normal contract construction conditions. Adverse weather conditions would be an important factor when a project would require a year for completion which under normal conditions would be completed in less than 6 months. This is particularly true in highway, flood control, and erosion work.

The same conditions would apply to work done on force account by the Government or municipalities. While it is difficult to estimate in dollars and cents the additional cost that would necessarily accrue under the McCarran amendment, it is clear, at least to me, that it would involve a very large additional expenditure, and that fact would exhaust the appropriation more quickly and would of necessity result in the elimination of projects which otherwise would be provided for.

It is well to take into consideration the relative average efficiency of those on the relief rolls as compared with the average efficiency of those being paid the prevailing wage scale in private industry. It is undoubtedly true that many on the relief rolls are as efficient as the best workers now normally employed. It is also generally recognized that when private industry finds it necessary to reduce the number of employees relative efficiency is a large factor in selecting the workers to be separated from the service. The application of that rule has been specially hurtful to those who have grown old.

It is hoped, in the interest of the financial status of the Government and of the lightening of the load upon the taxpayers, that many of the projects will be to a large extent self-liquidating, either through the repayment of the amount expended by the Government or in the construction of public works, such as roads, rivers and harbors, and flood control, which are of a permanent nature, and which, at some time in the future, would otherwise call for appropriations. Surely we do not want to put into operation a needless and wasteful program. The McCarran amendment would inevitably have that result. The volume of construction would be greatly reduced without taking into account the increase in cost for the projects actually completed.

It has been suggested in debate that the Government surely does not expect to get overtime from the relief workers, and the intimation has been made that it would be unfair and unjust to those upon the relief rolls to expect from them, on mere security wages, the same quality and quantity of work rendered by workers in private industry under the prevailing wage scale. The fact that full equivalent of performance, as compared with the workers in private industry under the prevailing wage scale, is not contemplated is shown by the estimate furnished the committee indicating that work would be limited to 6 hours a day and 5 days a week.

We should not lose sight of the fact that the work-relief bill is intended to provide made work for the benefit primarily of those upon the relief rolls. I am one of those who believe that relief workers will come nearer having a restored morale if they believe that they are earning the money paid them by the Government and earning it in the way of results from their labor. It seems to me that a program under which these relief workers are employed only about 15 hours during the week, or for about 10 days during the month, will more definitely impress upon them that they are being dealt with from a standpoint of Government charity than would appear if they were occupied on the work in a more normal way and for a longer time. The fact must not | sible evils to workers engaged in private industry must be be overlooked that the additional time given to work is not earning time lost to these people. In short, they are on the relief rolls because they cannot get any sort of paid work.

It has been frequently stated in the discussions here that one amendment should not lead to the defeat of the bill. The trouble with that one amendment under consideration is that it amounted to a substitute for the real purpose of the bill as declared by the President in his address to Congress. The McCarran amendment changed in a vital way the entire philosophy of the original bill. It had been definitely stated on the floor of the Senate that with the Mc-Carran amendment adopted the President would veto the bill. After that amendment I could see no good purpose in proceeding for many days with a bill which we all knew could not become a law. Every Member of the Senate knew that the bill could not be passed over the President's veto. We had no right to assume that the House of Representatives would insist upon the elimination of the McCarran amendment, and we had no right to assume that any Member of this body who voted for the McCarran amendment would change his vote. The responsibility at that time rested upon the Senate. It took deliberate action, well knowing that the action taken, in the viewpoint of the President, worked a complete change in the administration's announced program.

By the recommittal of the bill to the Appropriations Committee time has been secured for reconsideration of all the problems involved and for the application of the best judgment of the Members of the Senate in working out a satisfactory adjustment of the controversy which has endangered the bill.

Personally I very greatly regret the harsh criticisms, from certain sources, of my colleagues whose sense of duty led them to support the McCarran amendment. I feel sure that some Senators who are opposed to the entire workrelief program were not governed in their vote on the Mc-Carran amendment because of their anxiety over the effect on the prevailing wage scale. At the same time, I am absolutely confident that many Senators who voted for the McCarran amendment did so under the abiding conviction that it was better to have no work-relief bill than to jeopardize the prevailing wage scale. Those who voted from that viewpoint are to be commended for standing by their convictions. If I had been convinced that the President's plan, if left unamended, would have lowered the prevailing wage scale, I am free to say that I should have voted for the adoption of the McCarran amendment. Being firmly convinced, however, with all the factors considered, and knowing full well the extremes to which the President would go to prevent impairment of the prevailing wage scale, I cast my vote against the McCarran amendment.

I sincerely hope that, without further indulging in charges and countercharges, and without further insistence that some Senators cast their votes as a result of the pressure of organized labor, and without further charges on the part of organized labor that those who did not vote for the McCarran amendment are at heart unfriendly to labor, some formula may be worked out and agreed upon that will save the President's work-relief program and at the same time will give satisfactory assurance to the representatives of organized labor that the prevailing wage scale will not be in any way adversely affected under the program.

I have full confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of the leaders on both sides of the controversy. The results are too important to justify pride of opinion, enthusiasm of victory, or sting of defeat; too important to justify real statesmen and true representatives of their people, whether in Congress or in industry, or in the fields of organized labor, in permitting the breaking down and abandonment of a program which holds out such strong hope for better conditions to millions of American distressed people.

The leaders on both sides of this controversy are in full agreement that the work-relief plan must not be admin-istered in a way to jeopardize the prevailing wage scale. Surely, when two great groups are in full accord on the objectives of the measure and are also in full accord that posthe desired results.

I have believed that the Russell amendment, under a sympathetic administration, should be a satisfactory assurance to those who are apprehensive that the President's plan for security wage on Government-made work will destroy the prevailing wage scale in private industry.

WILLIAM P. M'CRACKEN, JR.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, this morning the Senate learned, by the report of the Senate Sergeant at Arms, Chesley W. Jurney, that William P. MacCracken, Jr., had been committed on February 26, 1935, to the District of Columbia Jail for the period of 10 days prescribed in Senate Resolution 185, agreed to on February 14, 1934.

After the report of the Sergeant at Arms, I asked leave to have printed in the RECORD following the report a statement by Mr. MacCracken referring to his situation. As I promised to do, I now read that statement:

After careful consideration I have concluded not to petition the After careful consideration I have concluded not to petition the Supreme Court for a rehearing of my case, and in accordance with the stipulation I entered into with the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate I am surrendering to serve my sentence. This I do conscious of the fact that I have done no wrongful act.

In this connection I desire to explain my position in connection with this controversy. Since 1929 I have been practicing law in Washington. Last February the Senate Air Mall Committee issued a subpena calling on me to deliver to that committee all correspondence and other documents in my possession relating to airmall contracts. My understanding of the legal and moral duty of a lawyer to his clients was and is that he cannot disclose their communications to him, written or oral, without their consent. I a lawyer to his chems was and is that he cannot discuss their communications to him, written or oral, without their consent. I immediately made available to the Senate committee every document in my possession excepting those which I believed could not be released without the consent of my clients, and at the committee's request I at once asked their instructions. As fast as my clients consented to the production before the Senate committee of their communications to me I instantly made them available. Before I heard from all of my clients the Senate issued a warrant for my arrest for not delivering over my client's papers. Before the service of the warrant all of my clients had waived their privi-

the service of the warrant all of my clients had waived their privi-lege and all papers then in my possession were delivered to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate.

There has been a great deal in the public press about the destruction of papers in this case. The only papers involved in this controversy that were destroyed were those delivered by my partner without my prior knowledge or consent to a representa-tive of one of our clients, and those my partner believed were of a personal nature and not covered by the subpena. There was not one scintilla of evidence before the Senate that in any way connected me personally with the destruction of any papers what-soever. I cannot make this too strong.

The papers that were removed from my office with my consent soever. I cannot make this too strong.

The papers that were removed from my office with my consent were, after my request, all turned over to the Senate committee before the contempt proceedings were instituted. The clients involved in this latter transaction were cited for contempt and acquitted by the Senate.

After the Senate's citation to show cause why I should not be punished for contempt was served upon me and they had adopted rules for the trial which made that body grand jury, prosecutor, trial jury, and judge, I concluded that the Senate under these circumstances, in attempting to try and punish a private citizen, was violating the Constitution of the United States. I took the case to the courts to test the jurisdiction of the Senate.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia case to the courts to test the jurisdiction of the Senate.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia sustained me in this view. The Supreme Court held adversely to my contention. In sustaining the power of the Senate, the Court declined to consider the facts other than to ascertain whether the charges made by the Senate were within its jurisdiction. In effect, the Supreme Court holds that, if the Senate is engaged in a legislative matter and charges a private citizen with an act which, if proven, would constitute an obstruction to the exercise of that function, then the question of guilt or innocence of the party charged and the punishment to be inflicted are questions solely for the determination of the legislative body, notwithstanding the fact that it is a political as contradistinguished from a judicial body.

I believe that some situation will arise in the future which will cause the Court to modify this holding. However, as far as I am concerned, nothing remains but to accept the punishment which the Senate inflicted. This I propose to do.

That is the end of Mr. MacCracken's statement.

Mr. President, in view of what occurred this morning when I asked unanimous consent to have this statement follow the report of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate-in view particularly of the allegation made here, and which has now become a public record, that there are statements contained in Mr. MacCracken's paper which are untrue-I avoided, some formula can be agreed upon to accomplish | summon as evidence to the Senate and to the great public of America the Supreme Court of the United States, as the best witness available, that every statement contained in that paper is true. Let me read from the opinion in Jurney against MacCracken, handed down by the Supreme Court at the October term, 1934, on February 4, 1935-Mr. Justice Brandeis delivering the opinion of the Court-the following facts; and I ask the Senate's attention to them with reference to whether they parallel the statement made by Mr. MacCracken. I am now reading from that opinion:

> MacCracken had been served, on January 31, 1934, with a sub-pena duces tecum to appear "instanter" before the committee and to bring all books of account and papers "relating to air mail and to bring all books of account and papers "relating to air mail and ocean mail contracts." The witness appeared on that day; stated that he is a lawyer, member of the firm of MacCracken & Lee, with offices in the District; that he was ready to produce all papers which he lawfully could; but that many of those in his possession were privileged communications between himself and corporations or individuals for whom he had acted as attorney; that he could not lawfully produce such papers without the client first having waived the privilege; and that, unless he secured such a waiver, he must exercise his own judgment as to what papers were within the privilege. He gave, however, to the committee the names of these clients; stated the character of services rendered for each; and, at the suggestion of the committee, telegraphed to each asking whether consent to disclose confidential communications would be given. From some of the clients he secured immediately unconditional consent; and on February 1, produced all the papers relating to the business of the clients who produced all the papers relating to the business of the clients who had so consented.

> on February 2, before the committee had decided whether the production of all the papers should be compelled despite the claims of privilege, MacCracken again appeared and testified as follows: On February 1 he personally permitted Givren, a representative of Western Air Express, to examine, without supervision, the files containing papers concerning that company; and authorized him to take therefrom papers which did not relate to airmail contracts. Givren, in fact, took some papers which did relate to air mail contracts. On the same day, Brittin, vice president of Northwest Airways, Inc., without MacCracken's knowledge, requested, and received from his partner, Lee, permission to examine the files relating to that company's business and to remove therefrom some papers stated by Brittin to have been dictated by him in Lee's office and to be wholly personal and unrelated to matters under investigation by the committee. Brittin removed from the files some papers; took them to his office; and, with a view to destroying them, tore them into pieces and threw the pieces into a waste-paper basket.
> Upon the conclusion of MacCracken's testimony on February 2,

Upon the conclusion of MacCracken's testimony on February 2, the committee decided that none of the papers in his possession could be withheld under the claim of privilege. Later that day MacCracken received from the rest of his clients waivers of their privilege; and thereupon promptly made available to the committee all the papers then remaining in the files. On February 3 (after a request therefor by MacCracken), Givven restored to the files what he stated were all the papers taken by him. The petition does not allege that any of the papers taken by Brittin were later produced. It avers that, prior to the adoption of the citation for contempt under Resolution 172, MacCracken had produced and delivered to the Senate of the United States, "to the best of his ability, knowledge, and belief, every paper of every kind and description in his possession or under his control, relating in any way to air mail and ocean mail contracts; [and that] on February 5, 1934, * * * all of said papers were turned over and delivered to said Senate committee and since that date they have been, and they now are, in the possession of said committee." Upon the conclusion of MacCracken's testimony on February 2,

That is the end of the part of the opinion which I am quoting. I now turn back to page 2 of the opinion, and take this extract from it. This is the Court speaking, through Mr. Justice Brandeis:

The claim of privilege hereinafter referred to is no longer an issue. MacCracken's sole contention is that the Senate was without power to arrest him with a view to punishing him, because the act complained of—the alleged destruction and removal of the papers after service of the subpena—was "the past commission of a completed act which prior to the arrest and the proceedings to punish had reached such a stage of finality that it could not longer affect the proceedings of the Senate or any committee thereof, and which, and the effects of which, had been undone long before the arrest."

Thus it is seen that the statement by Mr. MacCracken of what the issue was is entirely, precisely, exactly according to fact as stated by the Supreme Court. The issue was not the question tried by the Senate of the United States of whether MacCracken was guilty or not guilty of a contempt. The question was not whether MacCracken had destroyed any papers or had not done so. The question was not whether MacCracken had delivered or not delivered all the papers he was called upon to deliver. The statement of | to the power of the Senate to try him for contempt and to fact, however, shows that the Court had before it the com- | reach a conclusion imposing a penalty. plete and entire innocence of this man of the facts alleged against him, namely, that he had not interfered with the processes of justice, he had not interfered with the proceedings of the Senate in the manner alleged in the complaint, but, on the contrary, had delivered or had caused to be delivered all the papers which were then within his reach.

So the whole question passed upon by the Supreme Court was that which the Supreme Court itself declared, namely, the constitutional question of the power or lack of power of the Senate to punish a citizen of the United States for an act that is so far completed in the past that it cannot and it does not interfere with the processes of legislation.

Now I turn to another part of the Supreme Court's opinion to support this statement in the paper of Mr. MacCracken which I have read, as follows-quoting from page 2:

In sustaining the power of the Senate, the Court declined to consider the facts other than to ascertain whether the charges made by the Senate were within its jurisdiction.

Now let us summon the Supreme Court on that question and see whether or not the statement of Mr. MacCracken is according to the facts. I now read from the opinion on page 7, paragraph third, as follows:

Third. MacCracken contends that he is not punishable for con-Third. MacCracken contends that he is not punishable for contempt, because the obstruction, if any, which he caused to legislative processes, had been entirely removed and its evil effects undone before the contempt proceedings were instituted. He points to the allegations in the petition for habeas corpus that he had surrendered all papers in his possession; that he was ready and willing to give any additional testimony which the committee might require; that he had secured the return of the papers taken the files had been write his properties. from the files by Givven, with his permission; and that he was in no way responsible for the removal and destruction of the papers by Brittin. This contention goes to the question of the papers by Brittin. This contention goes to the question of guilt, not to that of the jurisdiction of the Senate. The contempt with which MacCracken is charged is "the destruction and removal of certain papers." Whether he is guilty, and whether he has so far purged himself of contempt that he does not now deserve punishment, are the questions which the Senate proposes to try. The respondent to the position did not by demurring trensfer to the court the the questions which the Senate proposes to try. The respondent to the petition did not, by demurring, transfer to the court the decision of those questions. The sole function of the writ of habeas corpus is to have the court decide whether the Senate has jurisdiction to make the determination which it proposes.

And the Court decided it against MacCracken's claim and

The judgment of the court of appeals should be reversed, and that of the Supreme Court of the District should be affirmed.

Mr. President, I had no intention to make any remarks about this remarkable condition of public affairs, for nothing that has occurred in years compares with this particular situation to throw light upon what today is taking place in our country. Here is a citizen whose rights-inviolable rights-have been taken from him by vote of the United States Senate. Here is a citizen of the United States serving a sentence of the Senate of the United States upon facts which one of those who voted for his sentence this morning declared showed him to be an innocent man.

I consider that the opinion of the Supreme Court and the statement of William P. MacCracken, Jr., should be placed in the RECORD for the sake of citizens of the United States of America, and if it will awaken them to the conditions that exist today, or if it will help to arouse them to a defense of human rights, then I will have done more, Mr. President, than I had contemplated.

Moreover, Mr. President, that statement of William P. MacCracken, Jr., when published in the RECORD of the United States Senate will ever be to the son of that man a sanctuary against the finger of accusation that might be pointed to his father's record in some time of emotional uprising, political or otherwise.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is not my thought that the case of Mr. MacCracken should be reviewed by the Senate at this time; nor do I believe that the statement made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], who has just taken his seat, is just to the Senate.

It will be recalled, as is stated by the Supreme Court in the opinion to which the Senator from Vermont referred, that the primary contention of Mr. MacCracken did not relate to the question of his guilt or innocence; it related solely reach a conclusion imposing a penalty.

In the proceeding which was instituted by the respondent, Mr. MacCracken, the theory alone was relied upon that the Senate was acting outside its constitutional power. A statement of facts, which I believe to be accurate, is incorporated in the Supreme Court's decision.

Referring to the contention of Mr. MacCracken and his counsel, the Supreme Court says:

The argument is that the power may be used by the legislative body merely as a means of removing an existing obstruction to the performance of its duties; that the power to punish ceases as soon as the obstruction has been removed, or its removal has be-

There was evidence to show that action on the part of Mr. MacCracken had rendered it impossible for him to submit all the papers for which the subpena duces tecum of the Senate called. He had summoned certain clients and, without exhibiting the papers to the Senate and giving the Senate the opportunity to pass judgment on the relevancy of those papers, had permitted certain clients to withdraw papers which they thought were of a private nature and not related to the subject matter of inquiry.

It is true that he sought to shield himself behind the privilege which attaches to an attorney acting in a professional capacity; but the circumstances did not prove or tend to prove that the task which Mr. MacCracken was performing was a professional task. On the contrary they tended to show and did show that his services were those of a legislative representative frequently called lobbyist.

The Supreme Court did not and could not, under the proceeding which the respondent instituted, pass upon the question of guilt or innocence. That was the province of the Senate. On the 14th of February, 1934, the Senate, by a vote of 62 to 22, adjudged Mr. MacCracken guilty of contempt, and by another vote of 56 to 26 directed that a penalty of 10 days' imprisonment be imposed upon him.

The sole issue in the proceeding which was finally passed upon by the Supreme Court was whether the Senate had power or authority to render the judgment which it did render. It may be recalled that the same issues which the Senator from Vermont raises here now were raised during the trial of Mr. MacCracken. It will be recalled that the contention was made in the trial that if it had passed beyond the power of the respondent, by actions of his own or actions to which he had consented, to comply with the order of the Senate he should be held to have purged himself of contempt and that the Senate would have no authority for further process against him. Now, after the case has gone to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court has said that from the very beginning of the Government the power which the respondent controverted and denied has existed in the two branches of the Congress to try and punish for contempt, the Senator from Vermont places in the RECORD a statement which reflects upon the integrity of the proceeding of the Senate and which impeaches the correctness of the proceedings of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I sympathize with anyone who is so unfortunate as to find himself under the necessity of suffering a penalty imposed in accordance with law, but it ill becomes the respondent, after he has had a trial in a proceeding which he instituted, limiting the authority of the tribunal according to his own pleasure and according to his right, still to insist that the decision of the Supreme Court was wrong. It ill becomes any Senator, in my judgment, to assert and insist that the respondent has been oppressed or treated unjustly.

The Supreme Court said in its opinion:

The power to punish a private citizen for a past and completed act was exerted by Congress as early as 1795; and since then it has been exercised on several occasions.

The question raised was whether the Congress has the power to punish a private citizen for a past and completed act as in the nature of contempt.

Continuing, the Supreme Court said:

It was asserted before the Revolution, by the colonial assemblies, in imitation of the British House of Commons, and afterward by the Continental Congress and by State legislative bodies. In Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat. 204), decided in 1821, it was held that the House had power to punish a private citizen for an attempt to bribe a Member. No case has been found in which an exertion of the power to punish for contempt has been successfully challenged on the ground that, before punishment, the offending act had been consummated or that the obstruction suffered was irremediable. The statements and opinion in Marshall v. Gordon, supra, upon which Mr. MacCracken relies, must be read in the light of the particular facts. light of the particular facts.

I omit a part of the decision and continue reading:

Here we are concerned, not with an extension of congressional privilege but with vindication of the established and essential privilege of requiring the production of evidence. For this purpose the power to punish for a past contempt is an appropriate

The Senate was ridiculed in the trial for its alleged violation of the constitutional rights of the respondent, for seeking to hold him liable for a past and completed act in violation of its process. The Supreme Court having passed upon the subject and sustained the authority of the Senate, we hear again the very same arguments that were made during the progress of the trial. We are told that the conclusion of the Senate in imposing a penalty was unjust; that it constituted a violation of the rights of a citizen.

What right? Of what right has the respondent been deprived? Upon what ground is the Senate now to be told by him, while he is suffering the penalty imposed upon him, that he was treated unjustly, that he was oppressed? Upon what grounds are the findings and the conclusions of the Supreme Court assailed and, by implication, charged to be unjust?

The importance of this case was recognized by the country at large. It involved questions which related to the constitutional power of the Congress to obtain evidence in connection with the performance of legislative duties. The statement of facts contained in the Supreme Court opinion, correctly reviewing the evidence, does not justify an attack on the Senate, or on the integrity and justice of its proceedings.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In support of what the able Senator from Arkansas has just said, is it not true that the Supreme Court passed on two questions-first, the jurisdiction of the United States Senate; second, the determination of guilt of Mr. MacCracken-deciding as to the first that the Senate had jurisdiction, and in regard to the second that the Senate had tried, or was planning to try, Mr. MacCracken with a view to a finding of guilt? If that be true, is it not to be assumed that the Supreme Court impliedly found that there had been no denial to Mr. MacCracken of any constitutional rights?

May I also ask the Senator if, in his judgment, the sentence imposed by the Senate, and sustained by the Supreme Court, was not an extremely moderate one under all the circumstances?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Colorado, I do not understand that the Supreme Court passed upon the questions of fact involved in the trial of Mr. MacCracken by the Senate. My understanding is that the one point which was relied upon by Mr. MacCracken was that the Senate had no power to try him at all, had no jurisdiction to impose any penalty upon him. I do not understand that the Court could have passed, under the proceedings which Mr. MacCracken elected to pursue, upon the direct question of his guilt or innocence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator will permit me, the Supreme Court did, however, hold, did it not, that the Senate had undertaken to determine the question of guilt?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. And by implication I was suggesting that it thereby held that no constitutional rights had so far been infringed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I have not read the official report of the opinion; but, as reported in the newspapers, I understood preme Court; but I will say that had I been on the bench the Court to say that it did not assume to pass upon the question of guilt or innocence.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is what I have said.

Mr. BORAH. It was simply passing upon the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. In the habeas corpus proceeding which was chosen by Mr. MacCracken as his remedy, the Court, as I understand their decision and as I understand the general principle of the law applicable, could not pass directly upon the question of guilt or innocence. The Court, in its opinion, states, among other things, referring to a contention raised by counsel for the respondent:

This contention goes to the question of guilt, not to that of the jurisdiction of the Senate. The contempt with which Mac-Cracken is charged is "the destruction and removal of certain papers." Whether he is guilty, and whether he has * * * purged himself * * * are the questions which the Senate

It is a well-defined rule of law that in proceedings like that which Mr. MacCracken instituted, the appellate court does not pass upon the weight of the evidence or the credibility of the witnesses. Mr. MacCracken relied upon the contention that the Senate was acting without authority; that it was violating his personal rights in trying him at all and imposing any penalty upon him. When the court held that from the beginning of the Government, and even prior to the adoption of the Constitution, that power and authority existed, it has some relationship, in my opinion, to the contempt itself, and to the manner in which the authority of the Senate was defied and ridiculed in the press of the Nation by the defendant and his counsel.

The significant thing in Mr. MacCracken's present statement is that after he has had recourse to every court in the land, in a proceeding which he himself has instituted and chosen, he comes back with the declaration, incorporated in the Congressional Record, to the effect that in spite of the decision of the Senate, and the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining it, he is still guiltless, and is still being oppressed

I do not wish, and I would deem it improper, to retry the case of Mr. MacCracken here; but it does not seem to me that the Senate and the Supreme Court should be put in the wrong after every technicality which the law recognizes and permits, and after every constitutional right which the respondent claims or can claim, has been asserted in legal proceedings.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am very grateful for the corroboration of my own brief remarks which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] has given. I see that he agrees with me almost completely about the interpretation of the decision of the Supreme Court. If he regards the introduction into the RECORD of the Senate of extracts from that decision, and the statement of Mr. MacCracken-which happens to agree with it almost in haec verbae-as a reflection upon the Supreme Court and upon the Senate, he will have to have the entire benefit of it. All that can be deduced from such an insertion he may have, and make the most of it.

No one who heard my remarks will charge me with having said that the decision of the Supreme Court was erroneous, or with having made any reflection upon the judgment of the Supreme Court in the MacCracken case. My remarks could be interpreted, probably, as claiming that the judgment of the Senate was wrong, and also as claiming that the decision of the Supreme Court did not affirm, in any way or in any degree, the finding of guilty by the Senate. On the contrary, thereof, the Supreme Court passed by that question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is an implication in that statement that the Court should have, or could have, passed upon the question of guilt or innocence of the respondent. Does the Senator maintain that to be so?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I was about to say that I would not set up my opinion against the opinion of the Suof the Supreme Court I certainly would have considered the question, and if I had found that the facts were as stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court that man would have been delivered free on the habeas corpus.

To go into this matter more particularly than I had any intention of doing, I call attention to what the Court itself noticed about that question. When I say the Court passed by the issue of guilt, my statement is founded upon what the Court itself says in the opinion. Hear this, a quotation from the opinion:

MacCracken contends that he is not punishable for contempt, because the obstruction, if any, which he caused to legislative processes, had been entirely removed and its evil effects undone before the contempt proceedings were instituted.

Was the question raised? Yes. Now, what did the Court say about it? Did they pass upon it? No; they passed it by, in the following language:

He points to the allegations in the petition for habeas corpus that he had surrendered all papers in his possession; that he was ready and willing to give any additional testimony which the committee might require; that he had secured the return of the papers taken from the files by Givven, with his permission; and that he was in no way responsible for the removal and destruction of the papers by Brittin. This contention goes to the question of guilt, not to that of the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Of course, it does; and that is the question this man was trying to raise there.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I am sure the Senator must not have read the transcript showing from what the appeal was taken. I desire to call the Senator's attention to exactly how the appeal originated.

Before the Senate tried Mr. MacCracken a writ of habeas corpus was sued out. The evidence had not been heard, and no judgment of the Senate had been rendered. The court sustained a demurrer to the original petition for habeas corpus.

Then, after the Senate did try Mr. MacCracken and did convict him, the attorney for Mr. MacCracken chose to appeal, not from a proceeding in habeas corpus in which the evidence had been presented, but he chose to appeal from a decision on the original writ of habeas corpus. So that it was wholly and completely impossible on the appeal which Mr. MacCracken, through his attorney, filed for the evidence to be considered by the court.

I desire to make an additional statement. The Senator has read from the statement of the Court as to the evidence. That is really not the evidence which the Senate heard. That is the statement which was presented by Mr. Mac-Cracken's writ of habeas corpus, to which the demurrer was sustained. Therefore, when the Senator reads from the statement of the Supreme Court as to the evidence, he is reading the evidence as quoted in the petition for habeas corpus, and it is not the evidence upon which Mr. Mac-Cracken was convicted. So that I am sure the Senator will agree, when he looks into the record, that it was wholly and completely impossible for the Supreme Court on that appeal to have considered the evidence, but it could have done so if the appeal had not been taken from the ruling on the demurrer to the petition.

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all, Mr. President; I do not assent to a word of that. I am surprised, indeed, to find as good a lawyer as the Senator from Alabama making such a claim here. Any lawyer who has had a practice in a common-law court knows that when the Government sees fit to demur to a petition for habeas corpus, it admits, and it must admit, all the facts that are properly pleaded therein. The United States appeared in the Supreme Court upon a demurrer by which it admitted those facts; otherwise the Supreme Court could not have accepted them, and written them down in this imperishable opinion here as they have done. I take them right on the same ground, and according to my recollection, those are the facts, indeed, from beginning to end. It happens, according to the records of the United States Senate, that they agree precisely with the records in all places where this issue has been up for trial.

Therefore, when the Supreme Court of the United States stated, from the point at which I was interrupted, the following, I say the Supreme Court passed over that question of guilt or innocence. Now let us have the rest of it.

This contention-

What contention? A contention raised by Mr. Mac-Cracken in the Supreme Court of the United States.

This contention goes to the question of guilt, not to that of the jurisdiction of the Senate. The contempt with which Mac-Cracken is charged is "the destruction and removal of certain papers." Whether he is guilty, and whether he has so far purged himself of contempt that he does not now deserve punishment, are the questions which the Senate proposes to try. The respondent to the petition did not, by demurring transfer to the Court the decision of these questions.

When, I ask, did that become the rule? I had no intention of raising that question in this body. It was raised by the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], and I feel forced to speak of them. The Supreme Court passed solely on the question of jurisdiction of the Senate.

The question was asked, What rights have been disregarded? What human rights have been overridden by this transaction, taken in its entirety, with all that it imports? I reply, rights so ancient, Mr. President, that no man knows when first they were put into writing. They go back down the ages even to a time before Runnymede and Magna Carta. They are the oaken beams that support the entire superstructure of the common law, which is the law of old England and the law of the American States, save in a few States; that law which was the expanding medium; that law which enabled the courts of England and the courts of America to adapt justice to the changing complexities of our civilization; that law which enabled the United States in particular to give vitality and life and practicality to the Constitution of the United States—the rights of property, of liberty, and of life.

A citizen of the United States for all time in the past, a citizen of England for at least 500 years, has possessed the inviolable right of having his confidences to his counsel protected in every court and jurisdiction in the land. Why? Because by experience it had been found, before that right was established, that without its protection injustice and tyranny could be wrought; because it was in conflict with the policy by which a man was presumed to be innocent until he was proven guilty; because it was consistent, and the only possible thing consistent, with the right of a man accused not to take the witness stand if he chose not to do so.

For centuries all tribunals have respected and safeguarded the right of the citizen to protection from seizure by violence and against his will of knowledge which is his, his private knowledge, and which remains his by virtue of this great fundamental right, although the knowledge is possessed by his counsel. So this is not the right of the counsel, and never has been the right of the counsel. The counsel never has any choice whether he will assert it or not. He is bound by law to assert it. He cannot refuse to assert it, and, no matter what subpena comes down upon him, the lawyer, in obedience to the law, in obedience to the ethics of his profession, is bound to refuse to divulge the confidence of a client until that privilege which belongs not to him but to his client is waived by the client and permission of the client is granted.

Does that impede, in fact, does it hinder the administration of justice? Not at all. In this matter the Senate could and did subpena the principals, the clients themselves, and when it had them there, also under a charge of contempt, did it find them guilty? Oh, no; Hanshue and Givvin were acquitted. But the man who had the honor and the honesty and the integrity, in law and morals, to stand up and face a committee of the United States Senate and say, "I am ready and willing to deliver every paper I have as soon as my clients waive their privilege, but I cannot do so until they do waive it "—he, among all these, must go to jail.

What happened to his partner, Lee, the only man who, according to the evidence, turned over papers which were destroyed? His name was stricken out of the resolution of complaint on the floor of the Senate. Many of us on this side of the Chamber, at the time we voted for that resolution, supposed his name was in it; but he goes scot free, although he is the only person through whose means and knowledge a client possessed himself of his papers and ripped them up. It was always a matter of remarkable peculiarity to me that nothing was done with that man. He had been a legislative clerk. The papers with which he was connected did not relate to the previous administration, but related to the Democratic administration and to then incumbents of the Post Office Department; and it has always seemed to me remarkable that the Senate's action should have resulted in nothing being done with Mr. Lee, but Mr. MacCracken should go to jail.

So, Mr. President, when I am asked what rights have been overridden, I say the client's rights to confidence, to safety of his property, of his person, of his liberty, of his life, to say nothing about the rights of the attorney himself, who becomes the martyr in the cause.

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I have another very brief statement with respect to the McCarran amendment, which it will take me only a few moments to submit.

On Wednesday the newspapers carried the report that, if the work-relief bill shall be passed, Mr. Fechner hopes to bring the enlistment in the C. C. C. up to 640,000, at a cost of slightly more than $1,000 a man, making his budget reach a grand total of $660,000,000. It is estimated that 33,555 civilians will be put to work, at from $100 to $200 a month. It will thus be seen that in the $5,000,000,000 appropriation bill it is proposed to add great numbers to the C. C. C. at an annual cost of something like $1,030 per person, while the President insists that the three and one-half million people on the relief rolls shall be put to work on an average of $600 per year, or $50 per month.

But let us pass that by for the present and turn again to the McCarran amendment and to the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] that, if the McCarran amendment were made a part of the bill, the cost would be approximately $2,340,000,000 more.

Under the President's program it is supposed that $2,100,000,000 will be spent for labor, or 52½ percent, and $1,900,000,000 for materials, or 47½ percent. The figures of the Senator from Arkansas are arrived at by placing the labor cost at 70 percent and the material cost at 30 percent.

I call attention, however, to the purpose of the publicworks program, namely, to furnish labor for three and onehalf million people now on the relief rolls. Certainly, from the President's positive statement in his annual address, we get the distinct impression that this is the chief object, and that the effort to improve industry by furnishing materials is a mere incident to the program.

I desire, however, to emphasize the fact that, if the President will operate under the McCarran amendment and stagger the employment so that it will average only $50 per month, it will take an appropriation of only $3,000,000,000 to accomplish his purpose. In other words, 70 percent of $3,000,000,000 gives to labor the $2,100,000,000 which the President would give it under his program. Therefore, instead of its being necessary to increase the appropriation by $2,340,000,000, we can, as a matter of fact, reduce it by a billion dollars and accomplish what the President wishes to accomplish; or, putting it in another way, instead of taking care of 3,500,000 persons, we can appropriate $4,000,000,000 and take care of 4,666,666 persons.

I know that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes] looks with some disgust at these figures, but I challenge him to correct them if he can.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I was not looking with disgust. I had come to the conclusion that the Senator from Delaware was a greater mathematician than is Dr. Townsend.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is exactly what I thought the Senator had in his mind.

Of course, if the purpose of the public-works program is to boost the industries which will furnish the material, this argument is not applicable. Neither is it applicable if we admit that we are willing to increase the "wealth of the Nation" by building public projects at the least cost by forcing men now unemployed to work for any wage the Government may fix. It has, of course, been pointed out many times by many Senators that the employment of a man for 2 or 3 days a week at full wage does not destroy the incentive to get a full-time job with full wage with industry.

It was contended before the committee by Mr. Gill, Mr. Hopkins' assistant, that upon the completion of this relief program the assets of the Federal Government would be less by a billion dollars if we should adopt the McCarran amendment. I am wondering, however, what the thinking members of the chamber of commerce, which association has but recently condemned the McCarran amendment, would say if we should propound these inquiries:

Shall we borrow and appropriate $3,000,000,000, pay the prevailing wage, and increase the wealth of the Nation $3,000,000,000 by building various forms of public projects? or

Shall we increase the amount that we borrow and appropriate by $1,000,000,000—that is, from three billion to four billion—with the hope and expectation that by so doing we can increase the total wealth of the Nation by more than $4,000,000,000 by compelling labor to accept whatever wage the Federal Government chooses to pay?

In other words, shall we put the additional strain of a billion dollars upon the Federal Treasury merely because we have the opportunity to exploit the labor of men on the relief rolls, and thereby increase the wealth of the Nation to the extent of that exploitation by building projects which we do not now need, and which, in most instances, can be of service to the country only in generations to come?

Should we not be doing a better service by keeping the appropriations down to the minimum and leaving some of

The mere fact that the American Raders

The mere fact that the American Federation of Labor is back of this amendment is no good reason why the chamber of commerce should be opposed to it.

The more we think about the condition of the Treasury, and the less we think about the fear that we may be charged with being controlled by labor, the sooner we will meet this question and pass upon its merits.

Mr. President, if anyone can point out any mistakes in these figures I should like to have it done. It is undoubtedly true, according to the testimony before the committee, assuming that testimony to be accurate, that if we pay the prevailing wage we shift the payment to labor from 52½ percent to 70 percent; and it is as clear as it can be that if we appropriate only $3,000,000,000, and take 70 percent of it for labor, we will have accomplished exactly what the President proposed to accomplish when he asked for $4,000,000,000 for the same purpose.

I should like to know why we are not on the safe course if we take the lower amount, $3,000,000,000, and apply the McCarran amendment to it, taking care of three and a half million men, and not undertake to increase the wealth of the Nation at the expense of the people on the relief rolls.

ADMINISTRATION OF CODES UNDER THE N. R. A.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask what is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is Senate Resolution 79.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 79) submitted by Mr. NYE and Mr. McCarran on the 14th instant, and reported from the Committee on Finance and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to address myself briefly to the pending resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first | amendment

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, in line 2, after the words "Senate Committee on", it is proposed to strike out the word "Commerce" and to insert in lieu thereof the word " Finance."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are two resolutions pending before the Senate which really have the same objective; that is, to inquire into the effect of the N. R. A. upon small business, and as to its fostering monopoly or monopolistic practices.

I myself have no desire to encourage two investigations. I see no justification for two investigations running along practically the same lines. I happen to be a member of the subcommittee of one of the contemplated investigating committees; but I am quite willing to forego the labor connected with that committee, or the honor which may be attached to it, if we can accomplish what we all undoubtedly desire to accomplish, which is to obtain the actual facts. We should have a thorough investigation. If we have such an investigation, it will be most informative.

I wish only to say that I sincerely hope the Finance Committee will give sufficient weight to the importance of inquiring into the question of monopoly and the monopolistic effect of some of the N. R. A. codes. In my opinion, they have had a much greater effect in that direction than was anticipated by some, although some of us did anticipate such a result from the beginning. At least 137 of these codes which I have examined seem to me to be distinctly combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, combinations for the fostering of monopoly, for the fixing of exorbitant and unjust prices. They have resulted in price fixing and in establishing a price list which is one of the forces retarding recovery in this country. They are extorting unconscionable prices from the people, and they stand in the way of recovery.

Unless we shall have a thorough investigation of that question we will enter upon the consideration of the N. R. A. bill without the information which it is necessary to have in order to formulate a measure which will protect the interests of the people of the United States.

So I say that, while I myself have no desire to urge two investigations, I do urge the Finance Committee to make a thorough investigation of the monopolistic trend which prevails at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Idaho that that was the desire of the Finance Committee, as evidenced when we had a very well-attended meeting on yesterday; and if the resolution shall direct the Finance Committee to make the investigation we will employ every effort to make an aggressive and thorough investigation in order to ascertain the facts.

Mr. BORAH. It should be remembered also, Mr. President, that the President in his message spoke specifically against monopoly and monopolistic practices and expressed the desire to have enacted a measure which would prevent them.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say further to the Senator that it is the hope of the committee, if this resolution shall be adopted, that we may have the full cooperation of the distinguished Senator from Idaho and other members of the Judiciary Committee, and also of the authors of the resolution, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NyE] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment to the resolution will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 1, after the word "and", to strike out "to make such expenditures" and to insert "to employ such clerical assistants"; and in line 5, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$5,000", so as to make the clause read:

For the purposes of this resolution the committee or any sub-or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents to administer such eaths. of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such eaths, to take such testimony, and to employ such clerical assistants as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire that any disposition shall be made of the other resolution, being Senate Resolution 35?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think not, at this time.

WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only briefly, and am only moved to speak at all by reason of certain observations submitted a few moments ago by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings]. In his presentation he referred to a calculation which he had made and which appeared to show that the so-called "McCarran amendment", with its prevailing-wage provision, need not of necessity add to the expense of administering House Joint Resolution No. 117. He made the point, as I understood his remarks, that the increased wages on the prevailing-wage basis could be had by the mere expedient of decreasing the number of days, leaving the total wage on the basis contemplated by the President but cutting down the amount of public works attained and therefore the amount of materials necessary for public works, and, of course, reducing the amount expended for such materials. According to his calculation, instead of an increased cost from the McCarran amendment, there would be an actual saving to the Treasury, and the total cost of the work-relief projects would be a little over $3,000,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000 calculated as necessary in carrying out the projects under the theory of the security wage.

I rise, Mr. President, first to express my concurrence in the calculation made by the Senator from Delaware, and, second, to do a thing which I think may be of service to some Senators, namely, to call attention to the fact that in the hearings there is a memorandum which was prepared in the office of the Administrator of the Emergency Relief organization which was presented to the Committee on Appropriations by Mr. Gill, the Assistant Administrator. In this memorandum, prepared on behalf of the administrative agency, we find substantial support for the comment which the Senator from Delaware made. I read briefly from the statement submitted in the memorandum by Mr. Gill, as follows:

Assuming the 3,500,000 persons would be paid at the local prevailing wage rate (80 cents an hour average), but that they would work only enough hours to provide them with a monthly earning of $50 (average), the wage bill would total $175,000,000 a month.

I interrupt the reading at this point to say that, on the calculation which has been made for the payment of an average security wage of $50 a month, the monthly wage payment was taken at exactly the same figure, namely, $175,000,000.

I now proceed to the reading:

Inasmuch as the hours of work would be decreased to 621/2 hours Inasmuch as the hours of work would be decreased to 62½ hours a month ($50 a month average wage payment divided by 80 cents an hour average prevailing wage rate), the amount of work performed, assuming the same efficiency, would be cut in half and therefore the cost of materials would be reduced from $160,000,000 to $80,000,000 a month, making a total cost of $255,000,000 a month, or $3,060,000,000 a year. Thus for $3,060,000,000 the Government would receive but 50 percent of the benefit that it would receive from the $4,000,000,000 program, and with the inevitable loss of efficiency, working men half time, it is safe to say that this loss would be considerably in excess of 50 percent.

This statement, Mr. President, makes but little comment necessary. It is obvious upon its face that the accredited officer of the Relief Administration, who was presenting the administration's viewpoint with respect to this particular amendment and the subject which is referred to in House committee thereof is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted, to require by subpena to be accomplished by which the labor bill may be maintained at exactly the same figure contemplated in the President's program, and that, if resort is had to the decreased hours and fewer projects, the material bill will be smaller, and that the total program, instead of costing $4,000,000,000 per year, will cost but little over $3,000,000,000 per year.

I insist that Senators who are sincerely interested in this subject should pay heed to the contention made by Mr. Gill in this memorandum, because, instead of it being justification for the claim that it would cost $2,000,000,000 more, it clearly demonstrates that the program would cost $1,000,000,000 less.

Therefore, when from various quarters we hear it iterated and reiterated that the McCarran amendment will bring an undue cost to the Treasury, we are justified in calling attention as emphatically as we can to the fact that that statement is based upon a false assumption as to what may be done: it is in violation of the theory contained in Mr. Gill's memoranda; it is an inaccurate statement; it misleads the country into the belief that something which may cost $1,000,000,000 less will, in fact, cost $2,000,000,000 more.

There is no justification for the claim that the McCarran amendment will cost the Treasury more money unless insistence shall be made upon a monthly working average of 130 hours. If, of course, the hours are held up to that level, and wages are increased, the total cost will be augmented, but if the hours are cut down, as the wage increase goes up, then, the labor bill, in its total amount, will be identically the same as was contemplated by the President; and there is not any reason at all for anybody to impute to the President a resolute and indefensible desire to increase the cost of this program $2,000,000,000 above his first estimate.

I may add that the prepared memorandum which was used as the basis for argument against the McCarran amendment, when it is reduced to its final analysis contains just one definite suggestion-not that the cost would be increased, but that the amount of public works secured by the prevailing-wage program would be less and of less value to the Government than the works which would be obtained if we pay the security, or starvation wage. So the question is not one of cost. The question is, are we to permit our Government to take advantage of the distressed labor market to obtain the services of labor at less than the value of that labor in order that the Government may obtain more for its money? And related to that question is the other, whether it is justifiable to risk tearing down the wage structure in order to drive a hard bargain with labor and thus profit from the helpless and destitute poor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I wish to add only a word with reference to the arguments of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Hastings] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. The figures to which the Senator referred coming from Mr. Gill, of the Emergency Administration, simply showed that if the hours were reduced from 130 to 621/2, less material would be used in one-half the time and, consequently, less money would be spent. It follows that if we should reduce the number to 30 hours per week and pay the same wage, the employees working only 30 hours, still less material would be used and less money spent. If we should give them the money and should not ask them to work at all, there would be still further reduction, because no money would be needed at all for the purchase of material.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Carolina whether my assumption is correct that the purpose of the appropriation is to take care of the unemployed? Does the Senator from South Carolina understand that to be its purpose?

Mr. BYRNES. Undoubtedly the Senator from Delaware has been absent from the Chamber, because the subject has been discussed within the last few days. The purpose of the joint resolution is to give jobs to three and one-half million people who are now on the relief rolls receiving a dole, and to give them a chance to render service for what they receive from the Government instead of receiving grocery orders.

When the Senator from Delaware joined the Senator from Oregon, who has just concluded his statement, in which he referred to the security wage as a starvation wage, he overlooked the fact that the people in whose interest this program is proposed are today receiving a pittance, and that they are hunting jobs and an opportunity for work instead of receiving grocery orders. The program was intended to give them a chance to work instead of continuing as beneficiaries of the dole. The Senator from Delaware prefers the dole. The people of America do not prefer a continuance of the dole.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator answer another question? If it be true, as he says it is, that it is for the purpose of taking care of three and one-half million people, and if it be true, as we contend, that if we adopt the McCarran amendment we can take care of them just as well with $3,000,000,000, is there any reason why we should not do that, instead of straining the credit of the Government to the extent of another billion dollars?

Mr. BYRNES. If it is a question of straining the credit of the Government, we can do it by simply appropriating $1,000,000,000 to continue the dole system. This program is to enter upon public works solely as an opportunity to give jobs to people now upon the relief roll. The Senator from Delaware is opposed to it. The Senator from Delaware wants to continue the dole system, does he not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no!

Mr. BYRNES. Is the Senator from Delaware in favor of continuing the dole system or in favor of giving these people work?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will be good enough to answer my question, I want to know if it be true that the purpose is to take care of the unemployed and give them what the President says they would get under his plan, namely, $2,100,000,000; and if we accept the McCarran amendment, would not labor get just as much that way with $3,000,000,000 as the other way with $4,000,000,000?

Mr. BYRNES. If we should give $4,000,000,000 to men working 621/2 hours a month, we would spend just as much money as if we should pay $4,000,000,000 to men working 130 hours a month. Even the Senator from Delaware, great mathematician as he is, should recognize that. I say that if we should reduce the working hours to 30 and still give $4,000,000,00 it would cost just the same amount, but we would not provide much work. The object of this program, as the President of the United States said to the Congress. is to give to these people jobs upon useful projects and to make them feel that they are earning something instead of continuing as beneficiaries of a dole system.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, is it not of great importance to keep in mind that the materials which would be bought will keep those in private industry employed, and if we use twice as many materials, we keep busy twice as many men who are normally employed? The Senator from Delaware ignores that consideration entirely.

Mr. BYRNES. In answer to the Senator from Texas let me say that I did not intend to make a statement on the subject at this time, but if there is anything that is apparent it is the correctness of the statement of the Senator from Texas. When orders are given for material, industry immediately receives a stimulus. As industry is stimulated the officials in charge of industry must seek employees. When they seek employees, three and one-half million men who are now hunting jobs will be removed from the labor market, and when the labor market is depleted by three and one-half million, the result will be an increase in the opportunity for labor. The Senator from Texas is correct in his statement, for it follows that as the result of orders for materials the workingmen of the United States now employed and men who are unemployed will receive employment in private industry; but as long as three and one-half million men without jobs are knocking at the door seeking jobs, men who are in jobs and those who are unemployed and upon the relief roll cannot hope for any improvement in their condition.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I merely want to submit two observations, and then I shall conclude so far as today's discussion may be concerned.

The first is that this is not a matter of choice between the dole and work relief, because the record discloses that of the three and one-half million concerning whom we are all very much interested, 2,225,000 are now on work relief, and most of them are receiving the prevailing rate of wages. That testimony is in the Record.

In my own State there are counties in which, of the entire relief roll, 96 percent are cared for by work relief rather than by dole. I have no doubt that in many places in the United States the percentage is as favorable as that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Walsh in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How long does the Senator believe that program can continue if the pending joint resolution is killed or left in the committee?

Mr. STEIWER. It cannot continue without appropriation, of course, but it can continue on the present basis of cost, which is now running about $150,000,000 per month.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator be generous enough to tell us what these men are earning per month on the average among those who are now on work relief?

Mr. STEIWER. I speak only from memory, but I took the trouble to wire some of the county administrators and I find that for common labor they are paying an average of 50 cents per hour and for skilled labor they are paying an average of 90 cents per hour.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that that does not in any way show what their average earning is.

Mr. STEIWER. I appreciate that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator further-

Mr. STEIWER. Let me answer the Senator's question. The Senator intrudes so rapidly that I cannot finish the answer I was making.

The evidence discloses, moreover, from the same source of information, that the rural average per week or per month is lower than that in the towns; that in some parts of the county the average earnings of farmers who were working on relief at odd times was as low as $19 per month. The all-over average in the county was approximately $25 per month, but the requirement for labor in most cases did not exceed 3 days per week, and in no case did it exceed 4 days per week; and, according to the information which I have, very many of these people had some other sources of revenue with which they maintained themselves.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. STEIWER. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the Senator referring to that program in approval or disapproval?

Mr. STEIWER. Not in entire approval, Mr. President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the point of the Senator's argument?

Mr. STEIWER. I have said that the destitute are not all on dole. I am referring to it to distinguish that kind of work relief from what is intended when Senators speak so contemptuously of the dole system, and to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Alabama that in those counties where the money is not wasted our people are not as badly situated as some of us have been led to believe, and the counties in which there is a desperate and deplorable condition in the main will be found to be counties in which there is a tremendous waste of the public money.

I did not rise to discuss that subject, however, at this moment. I shall do so at some future time. I found, from information from a number of these counties, that waste was rampant and inexcusable and that the people on relief were suffering by reason of the failure to utilize the money wisely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator in his argument referred to the prevailing conditions where work relief is now being given; and, as I recall Mr. Hopkins' testimony, he said the average earnings were $25 a month. I had understood that the Senator's statement was in approval of that and in opposition to the President's program, and that he was illustrating what was now being done in opposition to the security-wage program.

Mr. STEIWER. Nothing that I said indicated that I approved the kind of situation which I have described. I merely wanted to point out, as the Senator, I think, now knows, that it is not true, it is not accurate, to say that all this great body of unfortunate people are on dole.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have made no such statement.

Mr. STEIWER. Others make the statement; possibly I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator certainly did. Let me call his attention to Mr. Gill's testimony on page 9 of the supplemental hearings before the Senate committee, where he uses the expression:

With the average payment to each worker amounting to only $25 a month.

I desire to ask the Senator if he is satisfied with that? Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no! I am a supporter of the prevailing rate of wage.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Or if he is in favor of the program which contemplates at least doubling that wage on the security-wage program?

Mr. STEIWER. If resort is had to work relief, I favor doubling the amount but would not force a security wage on any laborer. Let me see if I cannot calm the Senator's fears just a little by calling attention to the map at page 5, also a part of the record in this matter. I do so in order to call attention to the average hourly wage in the State of Alabama, shown on the map to be between 10 and 19 cents per hour, and the average of other parts of the country. In my own State it is 50 cents an hour and up. The $25-per-month average that Mr. Hopkins is talking about is occasioned almost entirely by the low wage in those parts of the country, like Alabama, where they pay only between 10 and 20 cents per hour on the average for common labor; and there would be no such average figure as $25 if those parts of the country were excluded from the calculation.

Mr. President, I desire to make one other observation, not in answer to my friend from Alabama, but in answer to the proposal suggested here a minute ago by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes]. He made the argument in effect that although the wage total could be kept the same on a prevailing wage as it could upon a security wage without any additional cost to the country, there would be a loss in that there would not be so much work done, and therefore there would not be so great a market for the materials.

That, I think, is a fair argument, or would be a fair argument, except that it comes with but little force at this day and time, when we are advised that our Government has just concluded a tariff-bargaining treaty with Belgium lowering the protective tariff on cement and other building materials, because it means, in plain words, that the acquisition of materials under this joint resolution will not be a program for the distressed material man of America, but will be in part an effort to bring about a great cooperative, benevolent system of commerce with the world, and that the Belgians and other foreign producers will in part enjoy the benefits of the fourth and unnecessary billion dollars to be expended from the money appropriated by this resolution.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Walsh in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of Oscar Mikkelsen and Mark E. Bowers, assistant dental surgeons, to be passed assistant dental surgeons in the Public Health Service, to rank as such from February 5, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

NELLIE DOUGHERTY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye].

The Post Office Department has taken up with me the the case of Nellie Dougherty, nominated to be postmaster at Minot, N. Dak., in place of B. E. Stewart, whose commission expired in March 1931. It appears that objection was made by the two Senators from North Dakota because of Mrs. Dougherty being a Democratic national committeewoman. She is not any longer a committeewoman, and I desire to know if the Senator from North Dakota has any objection to the nomination.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have signified during the day my intention of waiving any objection which has been mine; but I hope the Senator has consulted my colleague [Mr. Frazier].

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not done so. He is a member of the committee. May I have this nomination put on the calendar?

Mr. NYE. I have no objection to its being put on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will report it, and let it go to the calendar, and confer with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Frazier].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and placed on the calendar. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Richard P. Williams to be brigadier general in the Marine Corps.

Mr. KING. Let that nomination go over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the nomination of Richard P. Williams to be brigadier general in the Marine Corps has been pending in the Senate since February 6. The nomination of Gen. John H. Russell for promotion has been pending since February 18. The consideration of these nominations has been delayed more or less at the request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Black], who brought to the attention of the Senate committee some alleged information into which we made inquiry; and after doing so, the committee were impressed that these nominations should be favorably reported and confirmed by the Senate.

The printed testimony was not delivered to the Senate until today. It was ordered some days ago, but was delayed somewhat; and in discussing the matter with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Black] I find that he does not desire to have the nominations considered today, as I understand. Is that the desire of the Senator?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, from what other Senators have said to me, I am sure it would be exceedingly difficult to finish the consideration of the nominations today if we should begin them today, and I know there are other Senators who desire that they go over. I may state that the evidence taken before the committee was distributed only today, and it is not all the evidence we should have liked to present before the committee. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] probably was interested and would be interested in having more evidence given before the committee. I certainly should not be ready to take up the nominations today; and I should particularly like to have the committee summon the two officers whose names I gave, who stated that General Russell was using property the use of which was prohibited by law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, that particular question came to the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the committee did make inquiry. However, they did not subpena the particular witnesses to whom reference is made, but made inquiry through the Department, and the committee was furnished information from the official records to the effect that the property in question, which was held at first at the Marine Barracks and later at the headquarters of General Russell, was obtained some 30 or 60 days prior to the enactment of a law providing that funds should not be used out of the particular appropriation in question for the purchase of articles of that character. That, I think, is the undisputed record. So the committee did not feel that it was necessary to subpena officers from Quantico to testify to that point.

I did not understand that the officers said that the property was being purchased in violation of law, but some person who wrote to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Black] made the statement, and the statement was made on the premise that the law had been enacted prior to the time the property had been acquired. The law was enacted some 60 days afterwards. So the committee was impressed with the fact that there was no guilt whatever on the part of General Russell in that particular.

I do not know how the officers could furnish any different evidence. The evidence I refer to is the evidence of the record which we thought was the best evidence on that particular point.

Mr. BLACK. Did not that record come from General Russell?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It came from the Department here.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask if the matter was not referred to Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, and if he did not refer it to General Russell for answer, and if General Russell did not answer, and if that is not the only answer that has been sent?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that is correct; but he answered from the records as to the facts. Of course, I and other members of the committee have desired to be very fair and courteous in carrying on the investigation, but almost invariably the insinuations and the rumors against General Russell, and also General Williams, upon inquiry have developed into merely suspicions or rumors, with no facts to sustain them. I never heard of quite so many rumors and suspicions being circulated against a person, which, when we go into the facts, we find vanish into thin air, for there are really no facts to support the contentions. The committee has endeavored to investigate all these things.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I sought on two occasions to have consideration of these nominations, but it does not appear that we can secure their consideration this afternoon, so I was just about to suggest that we have an agreement to take them up Monday afternoon.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I had in mind to suggest that we set an hour, say Monday or Tuesday at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, if we can so arrange, to take up the nominations and dispose of them one way or the other.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I desire to say, with reference to the statement that rumors have been traced down, that I intend to move to recommit these nominations, and I can give the committee a list of many witnesses from the Marine Corps from whom they can obtain the facts as to these promotions.

I desire to say in connection with the statement made that there has been sworn evidence before the committee that at one time General Russell was engaged in the command of troops, and that he surrendered or was about to surrender his battalion to one Mexican with a white flag. That evidence has been sworn to before the committee. I had understood, until I read the letter from General Lejeune, who, it has been testified, was present on that occasion, that I he had denied it. I have read his letter carefully, and he does not deny it. I wrote him a letter 4 days ago and asked him the question again. I received a reply from him, and he neither denied the statement nor affirmed it.

I have taken the matter up with the Navy Department in order to find out about the alleged battle of "Russell's Run." Marine Corps headquarters told me they did not have the facts and that I should take it up with the War Department. I took it up with the War Department, and I cannot get a statement there.

I think that before we consider these nominations, with the sworn evidence so contradictory as between two witnesses, General Russell and the other man, there ought to be some investigation. I am not making complaint about the committee; I want that understood. But I do think that before we take up the question, whether it is Monday or Tuesday, there ought to be some way of ascertaining just exactly what did happen at El Tejar, Mexico.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, is it possible that the battle was so unimportant that only two people can testify about it?

Mr. BLACK. General Russell, as I recall, testified that there were between five and six hundred Mexicans there. General Butler testified there was one Mexican. I took the position that if there had been between five and six hundred Mexicans there would be something about it in the Department. I have had all the records traced, and I have gone to every place I could think of, and I cannot find a single trace of this incident, when an entire battalion was brought up to aid General Russell.

Mr. BARKLEY. In what war was this?

Mr. BLACK. This was the war of Veracruz.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this involves a question of some evidence on a matter which I do not think is of any very great consequence. General Butler did come before the committee and complain, and among the things he mentioned was the battle of-

Mr. BLACK. The battle of "Russell's Run." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Which way did he run?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, General Russell says that there were a large number of troops there, and the evidence will show for itself on that point. The facts are controverted. General Butler, when asked about General Lejeune, said that he was one of the two outstanding soldiers in America. He placed only one other in the class with General Lejeune, who has written a letter here voluntarily commending General Russell, commending him upon his service in Haiti when he was there. He has the endorsement, I would say the absolute endorsement, of General Lejeune, as to his service in the Marine Corps.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It was during General Russell's service in Haiti that he arrogated to himself the right to arrest a United States Senator going to Haiti, was it not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is water that has passed the mill. That matter was before us when we considered General Russell's nomination, when the President sent the nomination in a year and a half ago. Of course, there are two sides to that question. I do not want to take the time now, unless we are going to consider the matter this afternoon, to discuss that phase of it.

As a matter of fact, General Russell says he was not the instigator of the move to keep the Senator out, but that he advised with others with whom he was consulting, and that he found it would be proper to let him come in, but the matter was taken up with the State Department, and the State Department directed him to follow out the orders issued by the Governor of Haiti, and that he was only acting under orders. So that is that.

I think that if we are to have the matter taken up next week there is no use going into a discussion of all the details this afternoon.

Mr. BLACK. Before we make an agreement-

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, let us be clear as to or whether we are to proceed with it on some other occasion. I suggest, with all due deference to the Senators—and I have no desire, of course, to determine any discussion between them-that if we are not to take this matter up this afternoon, let us ascertain that fact. If we are to take it up at a definite date, let us fix the date, and let us go about all these things in an orderly way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to have a date set for the consideration of the nominations.

Mr. BLACK. Before entering into an agreement I wish to say a few words with reference to what the Senator from Florida has stated.

There is evidence under oath from General Butler that he ran for miles with a battalion to rescue General Russell when General Russell was supposed to be under attack by Mexicans; that when he arrived he found no Mexicans, except that one man had come out from the woods with a white flag and gone to General Russell and told him that he had him surrounded with troops and intended to capture him; that General Russell then called by radio for reinforcements and a battalion rushed up, after running for miles, to rescue General Russell. That is under oath. General Russell denies the statement. He says there were five or six hundred Mexicans. I say that before the Senate is called on to vote upon this matter the committee ought to find out from some source whether there were five or six hundred Mexicans or whether there were none.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. BLACK. I have not the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate proceed to consider these nominations. If we are to have the debate upon them at the present time let us proceed with them and dispose of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield for the purpose of permitting the Senator from California to make the motion he has proposed?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, that is agreeable to me, although under the circumstances I had thought that probably we would save time by setting an hour, either Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, if the Senator will pardon me, to fix a time that is convenient to everybody for the presentation of the matters hereafter. but I am not willing to sit here and listen to a discussion upon a matter, which, to my mind, whether to anybody else's or not, was adequately explained before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to entertain a motion by the Senator from Florida, or to entertain a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that on Monday next at 3 o'clock the Senate proceed to consider the two nominations in question.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before the question is put, I desire to make a request. In view of the fact that General Russell has made one statement and General Butler another-and I venture the assertion that if the statement of General Butler were proved to be true there would not be 10 votes in the Senate for General Russell-I think we have a right to request that efforts be made to ascertain which statement is correct. I have exhausted every resource I have in trying to find out where the records are. I wrote General Lejeune, and I have written him since the other letter was written, but he has not replied to my statement about this matter. I have no objection to taking the nominations up on Monday. I intend to make a motion to recommit all these nominations at the time they come up.

Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, even though a motion to consider these nominations on Monday should be adopted, we would still have the right to move to recommit the nominations?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question about

Mr. BLACK. I shall not object to the motion, Mr. Presiwhether we are to proceed with this matter this afternoon dent; but I do desire to request that in the meantime the committee endeavor to ascertain whether or not there is any record of this incident at El Teiar, in order that it may be presented on that occasion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion before the Senate is that further consideration of these nominations be postponed until 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I understand the motion to be that at 3 o'clock on Monday the Senate proceed with the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is informed by the clerk that such action would have to be agreed to by unanimous consent, but that a motion to postpone the present deliberations would be in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is the privilege of any Senator to move the adoption of a special order for a definite time. I understood the motion to be that on Monday at 3 o'clock the Senate proceed with the consideration of these nominations in executive session.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, what I had in contemplation was that a special order should be adopted that at 3 o'clock on Monday next the Senate should proceed to the consideration of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion requires a twothirds vote to be adopted. [Putting the question.] The motion appears to be unanimously agreed to.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. BLACK I ask that those nominations go over also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations in the Navy will go over until Monday at 3 o'clock, at the request of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I think it would be proper to take up all of them together.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask that those nominations also go over in the same manner as the other nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Alabama the nominations in the Marine Corps are also postponed until Monday at 3 o'clock.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I call attention to Senate bill 409, which was passed by the Senate on Monday last. On the same day a similar measure-indeed, one identical in terms-passed the House of Representatives, and has been messaged to the Senate. I ask that the House measure be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 3464) to amend certain sections of the code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, relating to descent and distribution, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 380 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 29, sec. 288), is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 380. If there be no child, or descendant, the whole shall go to the father and mother in equal shares or to the survivor of them."

SEC. 2. Section 384 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 29, sec. 292), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 384. If there be no collaterals, the grandfathers and grandmothers, or such of them as survive, shall take alike."

SEC. 3. (a) Section 940 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 231), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 240. Course of descendents generally. On the deeth of any

"SEC. 940. Course of descendants generally: On the death of any person seized of an estate in fee simple in lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the District of Columbia, and intestate thereof, the same shall descend in fee simple to such person's kindred in "First. To his child or children and their descendants, if any, equally.

"Second. If there be no child or descendant of a child, then equally to the father and mother of the intestate, or the whole "Third. If there be no father or mother, then to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, and their descendants equally.

"Fourth. If there be no brother or sister, or descendant from a brother or sister, then the whole shall go to the widow or widower of the intestate.

of the intestate.

"Fifth. If none such, then one moiety of the estate shall go to the paternal, the other to the maternal kindred of the intestate in the following order:

"Sixth. First to the grandfather and grandmother equally, but if one be dead the entire moiety to the sole surviving grandparent.

"Seventh. If none, then to the uncles and aunts of the intestate, and their descendants equally.

"Eighth. If none such, then to the great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers, in the same manner prescribed for grandfather and grandmother in subdivision 6.

"Ninth. If none, then to the brothers and sisters of the grandfathers and grandmothers, and their descendants equally.

"Tenth. And so on in other cases, without end, passing to the nearest lineal ancestors and the descendants of such ancestors.

"Eleventh. If there be no paternal kindred, the whole shall go to the maternal kindred; and if there be no maternal kindred, the whole shall go to the paternal kindred. If there be neither maternal or paternal kindred, the whole shall go to the kindred of the husband or wife had died entitled to the estate; and if the intestate has had more husbands or wives than one, and all have died before mater intertate the research. intestate has had more husbands or wives than one, and all have died before such intestate, then the estate shall be equally divided among the kindred of the several husbands or wives in equal degree equally."

(B) Sections 941 to 951, inclusive, of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, secs. 232 to 242, inclusive), are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. Section 954 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 245), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 954. In no case shall there be any distinction between the kindred of the whole- and the half-blood."

SEC. 5. Section 955 of such act, as amended (D. C. Code, title 25, sec. 246), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 955. Whenever those entitled to share in the estate in fee simple in lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the District of Columbia, of an intestate, are all in the same degree of kindred to the intestate, they shall take per capita or by persons; and, where a part of them are dead and a part living, the issue of those dead shall take per stirpes or by stocks the shares of their deceased parents."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 4, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we wait for the blessed issues which are felt in the prayer of confession. Eternal Love, pity us in our limitation and minister unto our immortal souls. Do Thou forgive and encourage us. Keep us worthy of life's "well done" and inspire us with the promise of the rainbowed throne. Enrobe us with moral earnestness and endue us with that rich, vital power that melts discord into harmony. We thank Thee that behind all energy, every blush of beauty, and every throb of human life standeth God within the shadows keeping watch above His own. Send us forth today not shallow-hearted but with morning zeal to fulfill Thy purpose. Merciful Father, move upon the souls of man to feed hunger-bitten lips and clothe windswept bodies. Arouse us with the majestic words which are set forth in the splendor of a truly good life: "Inasmuch as ye have done unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me." In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, according to this morning's press, yesterday a solar plexus blow was struck against American industry, American prosperity, and American rights. It is very humiliating and embarrassing for a member of the Ways and Means Committee to be obliged to get his information as to tariff matters from the morning press. It has always seemed to me that that was one of the prerogatives of the Ways and Means Committee, but it appears no longer to be so, and tariff measures are now written in star-chamber proceedings behind closed doors, with the representatives of foreign governments participating therein.

I wish there might come home in full measure to the American people the manner in which their rights have been taken away from them under the guise of a trade agreement. Now, Mr. Speaker, every one of these trade agreements carries with it the favored-nation clause. The favored-nation clause is a treaty provision; therefore, it is a subterfuge when a tariff measure is written by representatives of foreign governments under the guise of a trade agreement. Any agreement which involves the favored-nation clause assumes the nature of a treaty and should be ratified by the Senate.

In this morning's paper we are told how gratified the representative of the Belgian Government is at this trade agreement, falsely called, but an actual treaty, that this is a "first step in a new deal of liberally conceived exchange of goods and commodities." Why should he not be pleased when tariff rates on Belgian products coming to this country are reduced by the trade agreement or treaty by 50 percent in some instances? The Acting Secretary of State in signing it also said: "More trade, more production, and more employment of labor in both countries." He should have said: "In one country, namely, Belgium." How will there be more employment of labor in our country when tariff protection as applied to competition from Belgium is reduced in large measure? Where will those thrown out of employment by this change of rates, illegally and unconstitutionally made by representatives of foreign governments, secure other work in order to avoid the necessity of resorting to welfare aid? I have no actual authority for saying that this agreement has been entered into, but I assume it has in view of the great pleasure that it has given the representatives of Belgium.

Mr. Speaker, the American people should be aroused to the fact that their interests are not being properly guarded.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachussetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. For a brief question.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I want to know if the gentleman has knowledge of the commodities affected?

Mr. TREADWAY. Only from the press account. According to the morning papers the tariff is reduced 25 percent on cement, asbestos shingles, waterproof cloth, cordage, certain woven fabrics, and photographic paper; 50 percent on prayer books, shotguns, and silica sand; 33½ percent on various types of plate glass; and between 15 and 25 percent on various steel items.

I do not know how extensive that prayer-book proposition is, but shotguns are very extensively manufactured in this country and especially in Massachusetts.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.
Mr. EKWALL. Does not the gentleman think we will need a lot of prayer books if this thing continues to go on?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. We will need more prayer books, and we will need more effective prayers for American industry.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have received a telegram from Purcell, Okla., as follows:

Have voted our limit. All McClain County schools, including Purcell, close Friday. Can you do anything about this terrible situation? Faculty will continue to teach if we can get any assurance pay will come later. Advise me immediately if you can consistently, otherwise our schools close Friday, March 1.

Mr. Speaker, I have received many messages of a similar nature from Oklahoma. The situation in our State is the same as it is in 26 other States in which I have made a survey. I have answers here from 36 States expressing distress in our school situation at this time.

There have been a number of bills introduced authorizing money for this situation through the Federal relief agency, ranging from $30,000,000 to $100,000,000. The Chairman of our Committee on Education has kindly promised to give us a hearing on the situation in order to outline a program or to give an authorization to the Federal relief agency for enough money to continue these schools.

I thought you would be interested in this matter since your States, through your State education departments have notified me of this need, and the members of the Committee on Education with whom I have talked would be pleased to have your reaction and your feeling about this matter in the next few days in the belief that education is necessary if democracy is to continue.

We spend Federal money to build roads. They go everywhere. A boy grows up in one community. If he is left ignorant, he may move into another community and live in that community in his adult life, therefore education should have a universal appeal, particularly in this distressed period. Then, too, since money is being used for different kinds of aid, especially roads and buildings, I believe it should also be used in an educational way. Education means peace and democracy—ignorance means chaos and tyranny. Let us keep the school bells ringing in America. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of the House again to the very grave situation that exists in Mexico today relative to Catholic persecutions.

The other day I put in the Record quite a number of precedents where the United States Government during various stages of its history intervened in foreign countries to protect religious minorities and persons persecuted for their religion. I shall again put in the Record the result of additional research in the State Department archives. I find, in addition to those precedents (see my remarks in Record of Friday, Feb. 1), there have been many more instances where the United States Government intervened in foreign lands to protect, not necessarily persecuted Americans who may have been of a persuasion in opposition to that which prevailed in such country, but where the United States intervened in the case of natives of those particular lands, who were harassed and molested because of their faith.

In 1853 we intervened for the protection of Christian missionaries in Greece. In 1893 we interceded for the protection of missionary work in Turkish Kurdistan. This was in the administration of Grover Cleveland, the same Cleveland, it must be remembered, who sent a sharp note to Emperor Franz Joseph of the Austro-Hungarian Empire when that Emperor refused to accept as our Minister Keiley, because he had married a Jewess; and we can see Cleveland pounding the desk with great vehemence and proclaiming that the Emperor would accept Keiley with his Jewish wife and he would send no other Minister. In 1895 Secretary of State Olney dispatched the U.S.S. Marblehead to the Gulf of Alexandrette as a protest against the threatened massacre of Christians at Aleppo and other Turkish cities. The Marblehead was joined by two other ships subsequently, and there was cessation of the difficulties. In 1896 we interceded on behalf of American minorities in the Society Islands. In 1895 acting Secretary of State Adee authorized our American Ambassador to France to petition that Government to intercede on behalf of American Mormons who were being persecuted in Tahiti and other islands of the Society Island group. But most important of all, in 1870 we made direct remonstrance to Japan to prevent the persecution and banishment of native Christians in Japan. Below are set forth the details of this intervention. I believe it is one of the strongest arguments I know of whereby we can base immediate intercession in Mexico on behalf of its Catholic population. It is quite certain that the constitution in Mexico is a travesty and a joke as far as Mexican Catholics are concerned. They have no rights under it. There is a veritable avalanche of secret Catholic arrests. More than 5,000 have forfeited their lives. Priests, nuns, and bishops dare not appear anywhere for fear of arrest, banishment, or decapitation.

I particularly call your attention to these precedents because of the dreadful persecutions of Catholics in Mexico, to the end that some remonstrance be made by our Government. Convents and monasteries in Mexico are still the subject of plunder and brigandage, and those who do this nefarious work are unmolested by the Government; in fact, these acts of depredation are with the connivance of Government officials, and nothing belonging to a Catholic is sacrosanct in Mexico, and Catholics, indeed, today are being hunted down like mad dogs. Surely we cannot, should not, remain silent in face of such rapine, plunder, and cruelties to Catholics.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Would the gentleman advocate an ultimatum on the part of our Government, or what kind of intervention would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CELLER. Just as we did on January 10, 1870, in the case of the molestation and persecution of Christians in

I would say that if the Secretary of State, in a very kindly, unoffensive way, would send forth publicly some mild remonstrance couched in perfectly diplomatic language, it would have a very much desired effect. Any pronouncement, be it ever so bland, would be helpful. Any hearing upon any of the many bills before the Foreign Affairs Committee would also help, but the committee disdains to aid.

I may say to the gentleman from Michigan, you cannot wound the sentiments and the sensibilities of 40,000,000 Catholics in this country by allowing these dreadful things to go on in Mexico without some word from our Government. Catholics comprise more than one-third of the population, and in power and influence the proportion is greater. They are entitled to some consideration, just as my people are entitled to consideration with reference to what is going on in Germany today.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; but does not the gentleman understand that our foreign policy is controlled by the Executive, and this body has nothing to do with it. Might it not be well to take this up with the President, with a view to having it taken up with our representative there?

Mr. CELLER. I agree with the gentleman on that, and I may assure him that numerous Members of Congress have petitioned the State Department and the Executive to take some suitable action in the way I have indicated; that is, in the nature of a gentle remonstrance. However, I am informed no such action has been taken, and this is the forum in which to criticize failure of such action. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. The precedents mentioned, which were dug up for me by Carl L. W. Meyer, of the Library of Congress, are as follows:

PROTECTION OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES IN GREECE

In 1853 the trial and sentence of banishment of the Reverend Dr. Jonas King, of Massachusetts, in Greece, who had been accused of offenses against the established religion of the State, resulted in instructions by the Secretary of State of the United States to the American Minister in Turkey to the effect that missionaries sent American Minister in Turkey¹ to the effect that missionaries sent out by religious denominations in the United States to Mohammedan or pagan countries "are entitled to all the protection which the law of nations allows this Government to extend to citizens who reside in foreign countries in the pursuit of their lawful avocations." At the same time the American Minister was directed to say to the Government of Greece in behalf of Mr. King that the President of the United States expected that a formal remission of the sentence of banishment should be granted. To this request the Greek Government declined directly to accede; as a matter of fact, however, the judgment against the missionary was never enforced." was never enforced.3

PERSECUTION OF NATIVE CHRISTIANS IN JAPAN

On January 10, 1870, the Minister Resident of the United States in Japan received from the American consul at Nagasaki a copy of a joint protest of the consuls of the treaty powers at that port against the contemplated deportation of 700 Japanese Christians "to parts unknown." The tenor of this joint protest was as NAGASAKI, Sunday, January 2, 1870.

Sm: We, the undersigned, consuls of the treaty powers, resident at Nagasaki, have the honor to address you on the subject of the native Christians living at Urakami.

It has been reported to us that 700 of these Christians are on the point of being compelled to embark on board of two steamers and banished to a distant part of Japan, thereby separating them from their homes and families, and from no other motive than because they are Christians. We do not address to you this letter with any wish to interfere with the jurisdiction which you possess sentative of New York, in the Congressional Record of Feb. 1, 1935, vol. 79, pp. 1362-1368.

over your people, but simply, in the name of humanity, to beg you not to adopt any measures of persecution toward the people at Urakami for the sole reason that they are Christians, for we can assure you that such inhuman measures will be regarded with indignation by the civilized world.

With compliments,

ALL THE CONSULS.

Upon the receipt of the joint note sent out above, the American Minister Resident addressed the following letter concerning this subject to the Japanese Ministers for Foreign Affairs, calling their attention to the disastrous influence which the persecution of Christians would exercise on their relations with the United States and other treaty powers: <sup>5</sup>

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN JAPAN, Yokohama, January 10, 1870.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellencies letter of the 30th of the 11th month, and of the 6th of this your 12th month (7th Jan.), the latter on yesterday, both relating to the treatment of native Christians in Japan.

12th month (7th Jan.), the latter on yesterday, both relating to the treatment of native Christians in Japan.

In this contention I beg to tender you late intelligence from Nagasaki by enclosing copy of a joint letter dated on Sunday, the 2d instant, addressed by the consuls of the treaty powers to the governor of that port. According to 2 days' later intelligence (namely the 4th instant), her Britannic Majesty's minister then at Nagasaki requested the Governor to delay for 15 days the deportation of no less than the 700 of those unfortunate people (referred to in enclosure), but in reply was informed by the Governor that these orders were peremptory, and that he had no alternative but to send them in steamers to distant parts of Japan. I cannot find terms sufficiently expressive of my profound regret at this occurrence and can only believe that you are imperfectly aware of the disastrous influence which this measure, if carried out, will not fall to exercise on the relation between Japan and all the treaty powers.

From the introduction of foreign science and of useful improvements for the benefit of the people, modern civilization is now deeply interested in witnessing the effects of Japan under the government of His Majesty the Tenno to take rank among the foremost powers of the world, and painful will be the impression abroad, and subversive of all feeling of good will now being created, when it becomes known that Japanese are being punished by deportation or banishment, or in any manner whatever, for professing, or pretending to profess, religious opinions in no respect interfering with the duties as citizens or subjects.

The absolute freedom in all matters of religious belief has been, and still is, a leading element of the ever-increasing power and

The absolute freedom in all matters of religious belief has been, and still is, a leading element of the ever-increasing power and prosperity of the United States, and nations may be said to prosper in proportion as their governments abstain from interference in matters of conscience.

There can be no friendship without respect; and if the Government of Japan now forfeits the latter by inconsiderate steps, its relations with other powers will be considered unsound and untrustworthy. The punishment or coercion of Japanese for religious belief will be deemed to furnish the measure of Japanese civilization. tion and will be so regarded by all the nations in treaty with Japan.

The loss of respect, I need not to point out to Your Excellencies, will necessarily involve a loss of confidence. It will turn the friendship that now exists into suspicion of the ulterior designs of your Government, and may, in the opinion of foreign governments, suggest the expediency of being prepared to guard against contingencies in future dealings with Japan.

while thus submitting in general terms the effects which any ill-considered action of your Government in this important matter will produce, I may be permitted to express the hope that the Japanese Government will take it into reconsideration, and thus enable my colleagues and myself to officially contradict the impressions which the knowledge of the contemplated treatment of native Christians, as thus far announced, will not fail to create.

With respect and esteem,

C. E. De Long.

Their Excellencies

Sawa Jusaunei Kiyowara Nobu Yoski and Teraschima Juskii Fiyiwara Munenori, Ministers for Foreign Affairs.

As a result of the representations by the American and other envoys to Japan, a conference was held at the Japanese Foreign Office on January 19, 1870, on the subject of the persecution of the native Christians by the Japanese authorities, in which the representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, the North German Confederation, and Japan participated. At the conclusion of the conference, Mr. Ewankura, former Prime Minister of Japan, expressed his pleasure with the "frank and open expression of your opinion" and voiced the hope that Japan and the powers would be able "to come to some understanding, which will save the necessity of further deportation."

On April 18, 1870, Mr. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, addressed a letter to Mr. De Long, the American Minister to Japan, saying, in part, that "the individual and co-

During 1893 the Department of State of the United States re ceived complaints concerning maltreatment of an American mis-sionary in the Turkish Province of Kurdistan. Having reference sionary in the Turkish Province of Kurdistan. Having reference to this incident, President Grover Cleveland, in his annual message of December 4, 1893, said that "information received of maltreatment suffered by an inoffensive American woman engaged in missionary work in Turkish Kurdistan was followed by such representations to the Porte as resulted in the issuance of orders for the punishment of her assailants, the removal of a delinquent official, and the adoption of measures for the protection of our citizens engaged in mission and other lawful work in that quar-

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS AT ALEPPO AND NUMEROUS OTHER TURKISH CITIES

In a letter dated October 8, 1895, Mr. A. W. Terrell, American Minister to Turkey, to Secretary of State Olney said that "for the last 2 days over a thousand Armenians have remained shut up in their churches in Pera and Stamboul, and nearly all their business houses remain closed. * * The attitude of the Armenians in persisting in their refuge at their churches tends to exasperate in persisting in their refuge at their churches tends to exasperate the populace among the Turks, who pretend to see in it a demonstration to arouse sympathy among Christian nations." In another letter of the same date Mr. Terrell pointed out that "the danger now seems so serious in the Vilayets of Aleppo and Adana that I would advise the removal of missionaries to the seacoast and ask refuge on the war vessel of some friendly power whose boats are near, but believe that now the danger would be greater for our people while in transitu than if they remained calmly at their posts." Shortly after this telegram had been received by the Department of State the U.S.S. Marblehead was ordered to proceed to the Gulf of Alexandretta. In reply to a note from the Turkish Government, Secretary of State Olney, on October 15, 1895, said: "The visit of the Marblehead to Turkish waters at this juncture is in pursuance of a long-established usage of this Government to

This course is very general with all other governments, and the circumstance that a transient occasion for such visits may exist does not detract from their essentially friendly character."

The Marblehead was subsequently joined by the San Francisco and Minneapolis, since the situation had become very serious. On October 24, 1895, Mr. Terrell wrote a letter to Secretary of State Olney, saying in part that "Language and transcription of transcription of the Porte that an era of transcription will now

INTERCESSION BY THE UNITED STATES IN BEHALF OF AMERICAN MISSION-ARIES IN THE SOCIETY ISLANDS

Since the treaties existing between the United States and France did not contain any provisions regulating the liberty of doctrinal teaching by American citizens in the French colonies, Mr. Rockhill, Acting Secretary of State of the United States, instructed Mr. Burton on August 6, 1896, that the intervention by this Government in behalf of certain American missionaries in the Society Islands "was necessarily confined to equitable representations that citizens of the United States in the French dependencies, who tranquilly obey the laws and regulations in force, should enjoy all privileges and immunities permitted to any other foreigners." <sup>18</sup>

INTERFERENCE BY FRENCH AUTHORITIES OF TAHITI WITH RELIGIOUS SERVICES OF MORMONS

In June 1895 the Department of State of the United States was informed by the American consul at Tahiti that certain American citizens, who were members of the Mormon Church (also known as the "Church of the Latter Day Saints"), and who worked as missionaries in the Society Islands, "had been forbidden to conduct their religious services without a special license from the President of the Republic of France. of the Republic of France.

of the Republic of France.

On July 29, 1895, Mr. Adee, then Acting Secretary of State of the United States, instructed Mr. Eustis, the American Ambassador to France, to intercede in behalf of the Mormons referred to above.

"I presume", said Secretary Adee, " that they have made their application in the proper quarter for such license. So long as polygamy was maintained as a doctrine and practiced as a fact by the Mormon Society, this Government refused to intervene in any way to protect them against hostile regulations or legislation of countries where they might be located. But it is asserted that they have now entirely abandoned polygamy. They profess to inculcate doctrines of the highest morality and promotive of good citizenship and loyalty to established government. The doctrine of entire freedom of religious belief and practice, prevailing both in the United States and in France, should, in the opinion of the Department, entitle these people to the same rights as any other religious society, provided they have actually renounced their polygamous tenets, and do in fact practice and promote principles of morality tenets, and do in fact practice and promote principles of morality and virtue. Assuming this to be true of them, it is hoped that the license desired by them may be granted by the French authorities."

PROCESSING TAXES IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and in connection therewith to refer to and include several bills which I have introduced in the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Commissioner from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a request from the Legislature of Puerto Rico and several economic institutions to introduce in Congress two measures intended to give compensation for the results of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which are as follows:

Whereas in the organic act of Puerto Rico, approved by the Congress of the United States on March 2, 1917, there is a specific provision to the effect that the internal-revenue taxes levied on tobacco and other articles, as well as customhouse receipts, are reimbursed to the people of Puerto Rico for the general attentions of the Puerto Rican community, and form part of the budget of receipts and expenditures of the government of Puerto Rico: Now, therefore, be it

Another measure pertinent to the same subject is as or commodity competing, within the meaning of subsection (d),

I also present herewith the reasons given by the Chamber of Commerce of Puerto Rico, in general assembly, for the necessity for such legislation:

In inviting these organizations to send delegates to the conference in question, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Puerto Rico expressed the situation in the following terms:

Mr. Fish at the same time pointed out that these "deplorable acts" had been committed "in the exercise of the internal authority which that (Japanese) Government claims to possess over its subjects." "The belated, unconnected, and vacillating manner in which the national administration has been acting with regard to the economic problem of Puerto Rico plainly establishes the fact of the great confusion which obtains in Washington concerning the subject. This evident confusion has created here a state of uncertainty, bewilderment, and doubt which has adversely affected all business activities in the island, adding to the difficulties of a situation in itself dangerous and highly prejudicial to the general interest of the community. interest of the community.

interest of the community.

"The present situation makes evident more forcibly than ever the pressing need for joint, quick, and persistent effort to bring pressure to bear upon the national authorities to secure a rapid and definite solution of our problem.

"The national recovery legislation has been in operation in Puerto Rico for over a year, and despite our repeated demands for compensation, so far we have been allowed to share practically only in the oppressive aspect of that legislation.

"The present moment is one of extreme gravity, that imposes upon us a grave responsibility which a fundamental sense of self-defense should prompt us to face with determination and energy."

Acting on the strength of the above invitation, which the assembly unanimously voted to declare, expresses the present situation very aptly, a committee was appointed and directed to prepare and submit to the national authorities in Washington, through the office of the Governor of Puerto Rico, a memorandum setting forth office of the Governor of Puerto Rico, a memorandum setting forth the great difficulties created here through the lack of prompt and adequate action on the part of the administration and to suggest the remedial measures necessary to quickly relieve the situation.

In accordance with the above, we hereby beg to submit the following:

The present situation has been brought about by two distinct causes. The first has to do with the application of the national recovery legislation and its effects on the economic structure of Puerto Rico. The second arises from the operation locally of the Costigan-Jones Sugar Act

OPPRESSIVE BURDEN IMPOSED BY THE NATIONAL RECOVERY LEGISLATION

The Agricultural Adjustment Act has taxed the people of Puerto Rico to the extent of over $3,000,000 per annum, in the form of floor and processing taxes on staples that it does not produce but which it consumes.

which it consumes.

The general advance in prices of American-made or produced commodities, brought about by the National Industrial Recovery Act has further indirectly taxed the people of the island—who buy over 90 percent of what they consume in the United States—to the extent of $18,000,000 per annum. According to a study made by the Chamber of Commerce of Puerto Rico, the island has paid $17,735,829.54 during the 10 months comprised from July 1933 to April 1934, over and above what it paid for the same commodities bought from the States during the corresponding period of July 1932 to April 1934.

In other words, the island has been called upon to contribute over $21,000,000 per annum to the economic recovery of the mainland and so far has received no adequate compensation for this grievious sacrifice. To gage the real significance of this tremendous burden it will suffice to remember that according to the survey of the Brookings Institution, as far back as the year 1927, before the two disastrous and devastating hurricanes of San Felipe and San Ciprián, Puerto Rico was facing an annual deficit of $10,000,000.

This increased cost of the commodities that we consume has

This increased cost of the commodities that we consume has increased by over 30 percent the cost of living in Puerto Rico, and since such legislation has not affected in a favorable manner the prices of what the island produces, the result has been that, contrary to the spirit and purpose of that legislation, it is exacting a great sacrifice from the people of the island for which they are receiving no adequate compensation.

We cannot conceive for a second that it ever was the intention of the Congress of the United States to work out the economic salvation of the Nation at the expense of its fellow citizens of Puerto Rico, a community facing starvation, which has for a long time been struggling under the great handicap of an increasing unemployment problem. Confronted by such stern realities and seeing that after one whole year the national administration has falled to proceed with equal promptness to establish here the agencies designed by that very legislation to offset the sacrifice imposed by it, no one could justly blame the people of Puerto Rico for the feeling that it has been utterly neglected by Washington. As regards the second, the Costigan-Jones Sugar Act, the lack of diligence or neglect on the part of national authorities has been equally glaring.

SUGAR CONTROL ACT THREATENS ECONOMIC COLLAPSE

SUGAR CONTROL ACT THREATENS ECONOMIC COLLAPSE

This act has ruthlessly reduced at the stroke of the pen the income of the island by 20 percent and that of the insular government by $2,000,000, but no provision was made beforehand to offset or compensate such reduction.

In spite of the fact that this law had a retroactive effect so far as Puerto Rico is concerned, which was bound to create serious and complex problems, the administration failed to anticipate them, although its attention was earnestly and repeatedly brought to them at the time of the passage of the act. The result has been the virtual paralyzation of the whole sugar industry, which has thrown 20,000 additional men out of work, bringing the total unemployed to over 100,000 people, according to the estimate of the commissioner of labor. The paralyzation of the island's main industry has been instantly reflected in the general activities of the community which depends to such a large extent on that industry. industry.

Owing to the sentiment as expressed by business, industrial, and agricultural organizations, the insular legislature passed the following resolution:

> House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, San Juan, P. R., February 27, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico,

United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: By resolution of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, and in accordance with the provisions of H. Con. Res. 3, approved this day, I have the honor to forward a certified copy thereof, for proper action.

Respectfully,

ANTONIO ARROYO,
Secretary House of Representatives of Puerto Rico.

Concurrent resolution to petition the Congress of the United States to provide by law, as a measure of emergency relief and to promote the economic and social rehabilitation of the Island of Puerto Rico, that the taxes fixed and levied by H. R. 3835, approved May 12, 1933, to relieve the prevailing national economic emergency by increasing the agricultural purchasing power, be levied, collected, and covered into the Treasury by the customs authorities of Puerto Rico, in the same form and manner as provided by the Organic Act establishing a civil government in Puerto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, to form a special fund in the insular treasury, which fund shall only be expended by the legislature to meet urgent needs and to promote the general welfare of the Puerto Rican community, and for other purposes.

Whereas in the economic crisis from which it is suffering Puerto.

Whereas in the economic crisis from which it is suffering, Puerto Rico lacks the financial means to provide relief for the hardships caused by unemployment and the conditions arising therefrom, to overcome economic difficulties, to alleviate disasters, and to improve living and labor conditions;

Whereas on May 12, 1933, the Congress of the United States passed H. R. 3835, entitled "An act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes";

Whereas section 9 of said Resolution No. 3835 provides that, for the purpose of obtaining revenues to cover the extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the national economic emergency, processing taxes be levied on basic agricultural products, including wheat, cotton, field corn, pork products, rice, tobacco, milk, and its products, and any regional or market classification, type, or grade thereof;

grade thereof;

Whereas Puerto Rico is a Territory, organized but not incorporated, governed by a special organic act promulgated by the Congress of the United States, and is also a heavy consumer of such basic agricultural products, that pays said taxes that are not only a heavy burden on Puerto Rican citizens but are the principal cause of the rise in the cost of living by more than 100 percent, which taxes are covered into the Federal Treasury, and which, if they were reimbursed to insular funds, would provide the means for establishing a special fund for remedying economic difficulties and would be the basis for promoting the general welfare:

Welfare;
Whereas Puerto Rico is oppressed by the weight of an unprecedented economic crisis that has brought about unemployment that involves more than 400,000 persons; its borrowing capacity is exhausted by an insular and municipal public debt amounting to more than $49,000,000; the sources of taxes are limited; and some works of collective utility and aggrandizement are paralyzed, and others are being developed slowly, all of which makes it necessary for the legislature to petition the Congress of the United States for an urgent and necessary remedy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate of Puerto Rico concurring)—

Section 1. To petition the Congress of the United States to

SECTION 1. To petition the Congress of the United States to provide by law, as a measure of emergency relief and to promote the economic and social rehabilitation of the island of Puerto Rico, the economic and social rehabilitation of the island of Puerto Rico, that the taxes fixed and levied by H. R. 3835, approved May 12, 1933, to relieve the prevailing national economic emergency by increasing the agricultural purchasing power, be levied, collected, and covered into the treasury by the customs authorities of Puerto Rico at the time such products are imported, in the same form and manner as provided by the organic act establishing a civil government in Puerto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, to form a special fund in the insular treasury, which fund shall only be expended by the legislature for the following purposes:

1. To increase the fund for the construction of municipal roads necessary for the transportation of agricultural products to local necessary for the transportation of agricultural products to local and outside markets. For this fund there is a tax of 7 cents a gallon on gasoline imported into, or produced or sold in, Puerto Rico, which amounts annually to the sum of $1,400,000, covering a plan for 1,500 kilometers out of a total of 7,000 kilometers of municipal roads in the island of Puerto Rico.

2. To finish the plan of insular roads, amounting to 45, and to maintain them. More than $20,000,000 of the public debt of Puerto Rico, represented by bond issues for which the good faith of the people of Puerto Rico is pledged, have been expended on this means of communication.

3. For attentions of the insular and municipal public debt amounting to more than $49,000,000, which hinders all progress and aggrandizement of the Puerto Rican community.

4. To furnish funds to the homestead division of the Department of Labor, and to further the plans prescribed by the Legislature of Puerto Rico for the establishment of workmen's settlements and agricultural farms and which plans are arrested by the economic crisis that oppresses us, a work that is the most important for social and human aggrandizement undertaken since important for social and human aggrandizement undertaken since 1919 by the people of Puerto Rico.

5. To rehabilitate all agricultural districts, principally the coffee areas, which, due to low prices, loss of markets, and disasters from which Puerto Rico has suffered in these latter years, have had to be exempted by the insular legislature from the payment of taxes, which has not only affected its budgets, but has also forced it to dispose of surpluses and special funds to aid the affected municipalities which have been rendered unable to attend to their public services.

to their public services.

6. To continue the plan for the utilization of water resources, for the establishment of irrigation districts and the generation of power and light, as a basis also for the industrialization of the island, since, as Puerto Rico has no coal mines, electricity is the white coal on which rests the future progress and aggrandizement of the Puerto Rican community. The insular government, by legislative action, has devoted large sums to this work, represented by issues of bonds that affect the good faith of the people of Puerto Rico, since, by amendments passed by the Congress of the United States, such issues affect the borrowing capacity of the island.

7. To promote measures to improve the municipal situation, health, and public education, to afford means of livelihood and work, and to meet urgent needs for the welfare of all the people of Puerto Rico.

8. To attend to the services of insular sanitation and charity. SEC. 2. That after this resolution is passed, copies hereof, certified by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be sent to the following persons: The Honorable President of the United States;

The Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the United States;
The Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular

The Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States;

The Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington;

The Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington;
The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes. Pending that, I ask that all general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, be limited to 2

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate, which shall be limited to the bill be limited to 2 hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. Taylor of Colorado was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself such time as I may desire to occupy. Members of the House, before presenting the Interior Department appropriation bill for 1936 to the House, I ask your indulgence for a few minutes to refer to a historical matter on this date.

THE CREATION OF THE TERRITORY OF COLORADO

On the 28th day of February 1861, 74 years ago today, President Buchanan signed the bill creating the Territory of Colorado. The Territory was formed out of a part of a greater number of geographical divisions than any other State. It is a part of what had theretofore been a vast Indian country. Parts of it had at some time belonged to Spain, New Spain, France, Mexico, the Republic of Texas, and the Territories of Missouri, Nebraska, California, New Mexico, Utah, and Kansas, and part of it was once called the "Territory of Jefferson."

Colorado was a Territory for 15 years and 5 months when she was admitted to the Union on August 1, 1876, as "the Centennial State."

THE NAMING OF COLORADO

When the bill providing for the original creation of the Territory of Colorado was before the Thirty-sixth Congress, it passed the House providing for the naming of our present State "The Territory of Idaho." But in the debate in the Senate, the Senate amended the bill and struck out the name "Idaho" and inserted the name "Colorado", and officially christened our present State "The Territory of Colorado", as they then expressly stated:

For the reason that the Colorado River arose in its mountains, and there was a peculiar fitness in the name-

And also because-the name "Colorado" is more appropriate and more harmonious and is the handsomest name that could be given to any Territory or State.

Those statements were made on the floor of the United States Senate on February 4, 1861, and every loyal son and daughter of Colorado has heartily approved of that sentiment from that day to this.

THE NAMING OF THE COLORADO RIVER

The lower part of the Colorado River was referred to by several early explorers by various names. But history seems to agree that it was definitely named the Rio Colorado—Red River-of the West on August 26, 1540, by the Spanish explorer Alarcón.

The river extended from the Gulf of California in Old Mexico about a thousand miles up to the southern part of what is now Utah. At that point the river forked, and the name Colorado ended. The north fork came about 450 miles from what is now northwestern Wyoming and was many years afterward called the Green River. The south and much larger fork came about 350 miles from what is now the north-central part of Colorado, and was many years afterward named the Grand River.

Those two rivers bore these two names for over 200 years. However, the Colorado River never actually reached nearer than about 80 miles to the western border of the State that was named after it until 381 years thereafter, from August 26, 1540, until July 25, 1921, when President Harding signed my bill changing the name of the Grand River to the Colorado River. The President presented me the pen he used, and it is now in the State historical museum in Denver.

The United States Geological Survey shows that Colorado is the highest part of the United States. The highest part of the main range of the Rocky Mountains, the backbone of the country, runs north and south through the central part of Colorado. The eastern half slopes toward the Atlantic and the western half slopes toward the Pacific Ocean. Colorado is preeminently the mountain State of the Union.

Throughout the entire United States there are 64 mountain peaks over 14,000 feet high. One is in the State of Washington-Mount Ranier-13 are in the State of California, and 50 of them are in the State of Colorado; and 45 of these 50 mountain peaks are in my congressional district. So I represent "the top of the world." [Laughter and applause.] I have the proud distinction of representing the very crest of this continent. I do not represent as many people as many of you do, but I represent more mountain scenery than any man on earth.

There are some 300 mountain peaks running across our State north and south from Wyoming to New Mexico-a gorgeous crystal chain 300 miles long in my district. When you gentlemen want to visit the mountains, after viewing the foothills in other States, come to my district and see some real mountains. [Applause.] There are over a million people visit our State every summer. In the evening, when the sun commences setting in the valleys, it shines for a long time on the western slopes of that brilliant mountain chain, and as the last rays of the sun gradually reach the top of those peaks we actually think that the sun sets reluctantly as it bids good night to that most sublime scene on this planet.

Mr. CELLER. And what does the word "Colorado"

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is a Spanish word meaning "red." It was called the "Red River" by the early Spanish explorers.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does this conclude the gentleman's remarks about Colorado?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOYLAN. Then I rise to say that I am glad Congress erected the State of Colorado, particularly when the election in that State resulted in giving to the Nation such an able and distinguished statesman and sturdy Democrat in the person of Edward T. Taylor. His life and works have been in true consonance with the lofty peaks of the mountains of his beloved State.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RICH. And I can hardly understand how such a good gentleman as our colleague Mr. Taylor could be a Democrat.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I thank the House for its courteous attention. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want now to take up the presentation of the Interior Department appropriation bill. This is the annual supply bill for all the thousands of activities of the Interior Department for the fiscal year of 1936. The Department of the Interior, as you all know, covers a wide field of activities, extending from the Arctic Circle to the Equator.

It seems as if whenever the President or Congress does not know what to do with some new activity they put it into the Interior Department. The President has added 14 new activities to this Department in the past year and added several more during the year before, so that at the present time the bill that is before you today carries an appropriation of some $11,000,000 more than it did last year. This bill, for the first time, carries the Bureau of Mines, and also the Geographic Division, formerly the Geographic Board. It carries the Division of Territories and the Division of Island Possessions.

That is one reason the bill is larger this year than it was last year. The bill carries $58,755,656, but at the same time it is $3,297,409 under the Budget estimates. We have cut under the amount recommended by the Budget by various economies, but it is still above last year's bill, as I said before. That amount of money is reflected largely in this way: There is the restoration of salaries from 90 percent to 100 percent of all of the Government employees, beginning the first of April next, but we figured here on its beginning the first of July next. That accounts for $2,091,726. Then we have a new grazing-control law that accounts for $250,000. The Wheeler-Howard bill that we passed in the last Congress, pertaining to the hundred tribes of Indians on Indian reservations and Indian agencies throughout the United States, accounts for $3,275,000.

We have cut a little more than that below the Budget. The Budget asked for $1,000,000 for the purchase of land, $5,000,000 for a revolving fund, $250,000 for organization, and $175,000 for education under the Wheeler-Howard Act, and we have cut that down to a total of $3,275,000. We have allowed an increase of $408,556 for the survey of public lands, exclusive of the 10-percent salary restoration.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, how much was that last year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I shall give that later on. I shall insert the definite figures. Our report and the hearings are very complete. The hearings cover 1,180 printed pages. The report is full, and if the gentleman will take the report he will find in the last part of it all these very elaborately tabulated, so that I shall not take the time to read the figures. It is a full report and a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If my colleague will pardon the interruption, it strikes me that when the Appropriations Committee cuts underneath the Budget experts it is contracting a very bad habit.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know whether the House will sustain the committee or not. That is up to the House when we reach these various items, and I hope the House will give attention to it, because it does cover so many human activities throughout the entire country.

I could go into detail as to the way these increases and reductions are made, but I will first take up the departments in order.

The office of the Secretary of the Interior is the first one we took up. It will be observed from the hearings that we have made some additions because of the additional activities that are heaped upon the Department of the Interior. I may say, however, that we have given to the Secretary's office what they asked and what the Budget gave them.

In the General Land Office we show an increase over 1935, because last year there was a large unexpended balance which they did not have this year and which is not reflected in the 1935 appropriation. There is an increase of $100,000 over the current appropriation for the Oregon-California land grants, which was provided for under permanent law last year.

The largest and most complicated item in the whole bill pertains to the Indians, the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The committee has recommended an appropriation of $26,627,260. That is $6,358,695 more than the 1935 appropriation, and it is $2,997,675 less than the Budget estimate. In addition, the expenditure of tribal funds in the sum of $1,312,280 is recommended in this bill.

The Indian Bureau is divided into a great many activities. Industrial assistance to Indians has been provided with $3,720,490. For irrigation and drainage of Indian lands $950,000 is recommended by the committee. When we come to the education of the Indians we will have a controversial matter on the floor of this House. The policy of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs is to curtail and reduce and to eliminate to a certain extent Indian boarding schools off the reservation—that is, nonreservation boarding schools.

He feels that those schools ought to be established on the reservations, and that there would be a great saving to the Government if those schools off the reservation were discontinued. We have not agreed with him in that case. A year ago we did submit to quite a reduction in those nonreservation boarding schools. They are principally the wonderful school at Riverside, Calif., Sherman Institute; the one at Phoenix, Ariz.; the Chemawa School in Oregon; the Albuquerque School in New Mexico; Haskell Institute; and various other nonreservation Indian schools. We feel they have been built up in the last 50 years and that we have spent many millions of dollars upon them, and we feel that a further reduction should not be made at this time unless and until it has been practically demonstrated that ample provision can be made for the Indians on the reservation, so that they may have the facilities for acquiring an education.

So I say we have run counter to the Bureau of Indian Affairs on that matter. When we reach it we will go more into detail. The Bureau of Indian Affairs recommended absolutely the discontinuance as nonreservation schools of the Indian school at Carter Seminary; at Uchee, Eufala, Jones Academy, Wheelock Academy, and Chemawa, Oreg.; and also a reduction at Phoenix, Ariz., and Albuquerque, and at Ignacio, Colo., and other places. The Chemawa School was to have been closed completely. We have declined to follow the recommendation of the Budget and the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Interior Department in that matter, and we have restored in this bill an appropriation for the education of the same number of children at those schools during the coming fiscal year that were authorized during the last year. Last year some of them were cut quite a great deal.

On the item of general support for the Indians we have been quite liberal, and we have been liberal in connection with education. Concerning the Bureau of Reclamation, we have simply authorized the maintenance and carrying on of those projects and of that Bureau substantially as at present. There is no new construction authorized in this bill. I may say that there is an increase in the operation and maintenance. An increase of $25,000 over the Budget estimate is caused by the elimination of a similar amount for the same purpose from the general fund and its consolidation with the Yuma project. The increase, then, over the 1935 appropriation, other than the salary restoration, is due to increased repair and maintenance work, which has become necessary by allowing certain Indian activities, schools, and one thing or another, and irrigation enterprises to run down. We think they are justified and necessary.

Concerning the Geological Survey, we practically gave them what the Budget asked for. As I recall it, we made one reduction there of $13,000 under the item for gaging streams. However, in the main, we followed the Budget recommendations,

The Bureau of Mines is an entirely new division, transferred from the Department of Commerce to the Interior Department, and we now must provide for the carrying on of that activity. The amount recommended is $1,417,311.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman feel that his subcommittee has given due consideration to the necessary amount of money that should be carried in this bill for the safety work in the mines? I understand that at a great many of these places the equipment has become obsolete. In a great many places it has become absolutely useless, and it seems to me that, as important as this mine rescue work is, Congress should be very generous in appropriating money along that line. I understand further that it is the desire of those who are interested in this work that this appropriation be increased, especially as it applies to mine rescue work, and that the Bureau of the Budget is now considering the matter of recommending to this committee an additional amount for this activity. I should like the gentleman to discuss that a little, because it is a very important subject and a matter that should be given careful consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] that always after a committee has held exhaustive hearings and reported a bill there are a great many people who suddenly discover that they need an additional appropriation, and they come to me or some other member of the committee and try to get us to ignore the recommendations of the Budget and the departments and inject into the bill new appropriations without a hearing, without any consideration. Invariably I have declined to do so. I am fully aware of the matter to which the gentleman refers, and I feel there is a great deal of merit in it; but I have advised those gentlemen to present the matter to the Bureau of the Budget and to the Interior Department and get their recommendation. If they get that recommendation and send to the committee an official estimate, we shall gladly consider it.

If they do not get that in this bill, there is nothing under the sun that will prevent them from putting it into the deficiency bill when we come to take it up. If, however, we were to open the door now to a large appropriation for something that has not even been presented at the present time, we are setting a precedent that would destroy the orderly consideration of our large annual supply bills. That is the way we feel about it. We did give them some increase over what they had last year.

Mr. ARNOLD. I hardly think this would be a proper matter to be put into a deficiency bill. The matter should be taken up in the general appropriation bill, because it is not in the nature of a deficiency. I am wondering however, if the gentleman has made any investigation to ascertain whether or not the Bureau of the Budget allowed this service what it asked for, or whether the Bureau made a cut on this particular item.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not remember the action of the Bureau of the Budget on this particular item. I do know that the Bureau of the Budget does cut down a great many requests, and they probably have cut that down. If they have presented it to the Bureau of the Budget and the Bureau of the Budget has rejected it, then it would be unbecoming, it seems to me, for us to try to put it in over them; and if they have not presented it to the Bureau of the Budget, they have been derelict in their duty; they ought to do so. I cannot see any reason why, if it is a proper appropriation to go in this bill or any other bill, it should not be added to the deficiency bill when we take it up. We have given them in excess of $30,000 over and above what they had last year.

Mr. ARNOLD. I fully agree with the gentleman that we should not force anything into the bill that has no merit; but if actually it has merit, perhaps the Bureau of the Budget was a little in error in making their recommendation as to the specific amount they recommended. That is my object in taking this matter up with the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Illinois himself is chairman of one of the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations. Let me ask the gentleman if he believes in the principle of putting things in the bill handled by his committee that have not been considered by the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. ARNOLD. We always try to give consideration to matters on their merit.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is not the question; does the gentleman's committee give them the money?

Mr. ARNOLD. We do not always give them the money because we feel sometimes they have not made out a justifiable case; but where they have made out a justifiable case I feel that they are entitled to it and that the Appropriations Committee should go along in an effort to do full and complete justice.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am chairman of this subcommittee. They have never presented the matter to me up to the present minute. We are very sympathetic with the Bureau of Mines, as far as that is concerned, and we have authorized one entirely new activity in that Department.

Now I come to the national parks. We recommend $15,-713,890 for the national parks. This is more than the amount allowed last year by $4,394,250, but it is $44,640 less than the Budget estimate. The reason for this enormous increase is because the operation and maintenance of nearly all the Federal buildings in the city of Washington and many throughout the United States that were under the War Department and under various other departments for years and years have all been put under the Interior Department.

The Battlefields at Gettysburg, Antietam, and a great many other activities of this kind have also been put under the Interior Department. Whether this is wise or otherwise remains for the House to determine.

The Bureau of Education we have treated quite liberally. It is not a very large bureau. We recommended $4,781,220. This is a trifle under what it was last year, but at the same time we feel that it has been taken care of amply and sufficiently.

The Territory of Alaska we have tried to treat liberally. The sum we have recommended is $1,148,185, and this is in excess of the amount that was allowed last year.

The Alaskan Railroad is an item I wish particularly to call attention to. For a great many years the Alaskan Railroad was coming before Congress and getting an appropriation of over $1,000,000 a year, and as high as $1,500,000 a year, over and above its receipts for the operation of that railroad from Seward to Fairbanks, nearly 500 miles in length

A great many years ago we built this railroad at the cost of $57,000,000, and at the time we passed that bill we promised that it would be self-supporting. It never has been self-supporting; but, on the other hand, we feel that if we take away that railroad the population would feel like moving out of Alaska. It is a great highway for traffic and it is a wonderful thing for the Territory. In area, Alaska is nearly one-fifth as large as the United States. It is an enormous Territory. There used to be probably 100,000 white people—or something like that number—there, but today there are only 15,000 or 18,000, and they are having a pretty hard struggle.

The first year I became chairman of this subcommittee we cut the appropriation for the Alaskan Railroad to $500,-000. The next year we cut it to $250,000, and last year we cut off the rest of it and gave them nothing but their receipts.

That has proved too deep a cut; so for the next fiscal year we are recommending $250,000, the same amount we gave them year before last.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. What do the receipts of the railroad

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is set forth in the report. Mr. MICHENER. Can the gentleman give me the approximate figure?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not without looking it up.

Mr. MICHENER. Is this money to be used for operating expenses or for repairs?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Some of it is for operating expenses and some for replacement. A lot of the bridges we built there originally were wooden bridges, and they are rotting down. They are rotting out.

Mr. MICHENER. Are we going to build new bridges where all of the temporary bridges are located?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not understand the gen-

Mr. MICHENER. Is it going to be the policy of the committee to replace those bridges with more permanent ma-

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; and the equipment and things of that kind will be renewed from time to time. We are trying to get the best there is.

Mr. MICHENER. How about the highways?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Richardson Highway runs from Fairbanks to the coast. It is about as long as the railroad. Both the railroad and the highway run from Fairbanks to the ocean, you might say.

The Richardson Highway is an automobile highway and has been very expensive, but nevertheless we feel it is necessary to the development of that country. In our appropriation for roads, trails, and dog-team trails, and so forth, we are taking care of that situation as well as the care of the Richardson Highway. As the gentleman knows, the Richardson Highway has been under the War Department until about a year ago.

Mr. MICHENER. Now both functions have been put to-

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, there are not 10,000 people living within 200 miles of the railroad?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I expect that is true.

Mr. MICHENER. There is no traffic excepting the little bit of stuff which is hauled in to keep the people in Fairbanks or in that general territory up there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is not quite right. Fairbanks is the outfitting post for all of that northern country, including the Klondike, the Yukon, and clear up into Canada; and the Canadian people have to bring their products to Fairbanks and ship it out over our railroad.

Mr. MICHENER. It either goes by dog team or highway?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. And two or three freight cars a year would haul about all the freight there is up there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. I think if we put the matter of the development and the maintenance of the Territory of Alaska purely on a financial basis we might as well move them out, because we cannot keep them up in that country where the thermometer is 50 below zero and snow 50 feet deep, with 6 months night and 6 months day. When we were up there we were able to read the newspapers just as easily at 12 o'clock at night as at 12 o'clock in the daytime by the natural light.

Mr. MICHENER. And fight the mosquitos just the same?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. The future problem of Alaska, I may say, is a serious one. We have a lot of redblooded American citizens who have gone up there and tried to develop that marvelous country, but they are having a pretty hard time.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has been there and knows all about the matter. His judgment is good. But does not the gentleman feel that there is no development in Alaska worth while during at least the present generation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Permit me to give you the picture of Alaska, as I see it, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan. There are three great resources. One is the gold and silver and copper.

The Kennecott Copper Mining Co. is one big concern doing dredging operations. They dredge out the gold. Then there is the salmon and halibut fishing. There is the fur industry. Those three things have produced enormous amounts; I would say pretty well toward a billion dollars. We paid $7,200,000 to Russia for all of Alaska. We have taken out of there pretty nearly a billion dollars, as I recollect.

There is this that sticks in my mind, however: Take salmon fishing. That is done by people who come from Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle, Portland, and San Diego. They go up there on ships with contract labor. The season is short for the catching of salmon. Some of the canning of salmon is done on the boats. They take from the waters adjoining that country all of the salmon and carry it out, and do not pay the people of Alaska a thing.

I visited the largest cannery in Alaska the last time I was up there, situated at Cordova. I did not see but one white man in the whole plant. His name was Williams, he was the superintendent, and lived in Seattle. The rest of them did not talk the language of the United States. They came up there; they work awhile and go away. It is also true that they can enough salmon to give every man, woman, and child in the United States two cans of salmon every year. The thing I do not like is the fact they do not leave anything in Alaska. They do not contribute anything to the Federal Treasury, and they do not do anything toward building up Alaska, although they take Alaska's great resources and go away with them. The same situation exists very largely with respect to the minerals. The Guggenheim concern controls their own railroad, their own commissary, and they run their own mines. They ship their products out of there. While it is true that has added to the wealth of our country in a way, yet the people of Alaska who are trying conscientiously to build up the Territory of Alaska do not get anything. They do not get their share of the great wealth which is taken out of there.

The same thing is true with furs. Those poor fellows go out with their dog teams and trap when winter begins to come on, and stay out a year. They come in with their catch. Many of them fall into crevices, many of them are frozen to death, and some are killed by wild animals. They take their lives in their hands all the time. They bring their furs into Nenana and other places. I went into one fur house up there nearly as big as this Chamber, and there were tens of thousands of furs in there. I may say that the poor fellows who catch the furs get very little out of it, but the buyers take them to St. Louis, the great fur center of the world, and there they are made into these fur coats and other things for which women pay fabulous prices.

I may cite as an illustration that my wife was with me in Alaska and we went into one of these large fur establishments and they had some of these beautiful ermine skins, white with a black tip on the tail. When they are made up into ladies' wraps, they cost enormous figures. My wife bought, I think, 40 of these ermine skins for 50 cents apiece and brought them home. Actually, this is almost robbery of the poor fellow who goes out and gets them; and I may say that the stock of fur-bearing animals of Alaska is being depleted.

This is the only criticism I have in my mind about our handling of Alaska, and, frankly, I do not know what the future of Alaska is.

Mr. MICHENER. In the development of any of the industries the gentleman has mentioned the railroad has no bearing, except possibly on placer mining, because, so far as the fisheries are concerned, the railroad is not near the fisheries.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

Mr. MICHENER. And so far as the Kennecott mines are concerned, the railroad is not near them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That company owns its own railroad.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; and we hear about the coal up there being developed. I think I was up there once with the gentleman from Colorado when we found that after they mine the coal up there they cannot use it on the very trains that haul it out, because it is lignite and, as I recall, they had a laundry to which they took this coal and washed it before they could use it. This is not going to pay, and why we should continue to invest millions upon millions in a railroad of this kind when we are investing money in a highway and the highway will serve every purpose that the railroad serves? There are very few people employed on the railroad, and no one rides on it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The highway is not opened all the year.

Mr. MICHENER. Neither is the railroad.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. STUBBS. I have been informed, I do not know how reliable the information has been, that no American citizen can get a job on our Alaskan Railroad and that practically 100 percent of the employees are foreigners. I was wondering if the gentleman could enlighten us along this line, and state whether or not this statement is true.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think that information is wrong. I know Colonel Olsen, who runs the railroad as the superintendent, very well. He is of Swedish descent and comes from northern Minnesota. He is doing a wonderful work. I think the reason people cannot get jobs on the railroad is because they have had to cut down. They have reduced their employees to the very limit. So far as I observed the personnel of the railroad, there is no foreign element there. I do not think there is anything of that kind involved.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DIMOND. From the questions that have been asked the gentleman from Colorado, it is evident that many Members of the House have an idea about Alaska and about the railroad that is just 100 percent erroneous, and I would like to have an opportunity to tell the Members of the House something about the railroad and supplement what the gentleman has so well said about the wealth of Alaska, only the gentleman has understated it about 50 percent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me remark here that I hope the House will very patiently listen to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND], when he presents Alaska to this body. I hope you will give him ample time and opportunity to present the situation because he knows it thoroughly. He has been up there a great many years and is thoroughly capable of explaining it. There are many, many equities in favor of Alaska, and I do feel that we cannot think of abolishing the railroad, no matter what it costs, and we cannot discard Alaska.

Alaska is really a great asset to our country. I stated on this floor a year or so ago that I believed we ought to take the Matanuska district north of Seward and open that to homestead settlers and we ought to pick homestead settlers that come either directly or indirectly from the Arctic Circle of Norway and Sweden. The people who have lived there for 1,000 years, under practically the same conditions we have in Alaska, have been prosperous and contented and happy. Alaska, I may say, is 40 times as large as Sweden, and Sweden, as I recall, has a population of about 15,000,000, while Alaska has something like 15,000 white people. I believe we should settle that Territory with people who are accustomed to living in these dark winters and short summers and having terrific cold to contend with—and I may say with respect to Sweden that they ship butter into New York and sell it there. Those people are prosperous and happy, and they are accustomed to farming in a climate of this kind; and they make a success of it. If we could have people of this kind go up there and settle on this land and have them produce what the country consumes, the situation would be quite different. I may say that in about 15 towns, when I was up there, I asked them what percentage of the produce they consumed was raised in Alaska, or what percentage of it was imported.

In every place they said 100 percent was imported. They do not produce what they consume.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. They have a growing season there of 120 days at the limit, and although millions has been expended experimenting in agriculture and all kinds of grades of stock the growing season is too short. It is different in Sweden. There they have a longer growing season. The Department of Agriculture found that they could get more than 90 days' growing season in a year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will permit the Delegate from Alaska to answer that. As a matter of fact, they have 24 hours of sunshine in a day, and crops develop marvelously in that time. They can grow more in 90 days in that country than we can in 4 months in this country. They could raise enough potatoes and vegetables to supply that country.

At the present time transportation is a monopoly, and the prices are so high because it is difficult and expensive to ship things in there.

Mr. WELCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. WELCH. The gentleman has referred to contract labor in Alaskan fisheries brought in from San Francisco and other places. May I state to the gentleman that these men belong to the Fishermen's Union, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. I know the gentleman does not intend to convey misleading information as to what is generally called contract labor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that they pay them after they get back rather than to pay them up there and let them spend the money in that country?

Mr. WELCH. No; I would not say that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They tell me that that is true. Mr. WELCH. The representative of these men who appeared in Washington before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I am a member, said they were absolutely satisfied with existing conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no question whatever but that the people who are exploiting Alaska are satisfied with the conditions.

Mr. WELCH. I do not think Alaska is exploited by organized labor.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. I happen to be a member of the committee, and I think the chairman is right in saying that the people of Alaska are exploited in that Filipinos, Mexicans, and Chinese are brought up there under the guise of American labor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Alaska and its people get very little help out of that work.

Now, as to the Territory of Hawaii, we have provided for the Governor and secretary contingent expenses.

St. Elizabeths Hospital and the Columbia Institute for the Deaf, as well as the Howard University and Freedmen's Hospital and other activities under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, we feel have been provided for as well as they could reasonably expect. In most cases we have hewed almost exactly to the line of the Budget. We have undercut in the aggregate, as we say, over $3,200,000 under the Budget, but we have allocated somewhat, making some shiftings and exercising our own judgment. We have four members of that committee at the present time from the West and we are pretty well acquainted with the activities for which we are endeavoring to legislate.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RICH. A year ago when the Department of the Interior took over some million acres of ground for grazing, it was stated by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor], as well as by the Chairman of the Public Lands Committee [Mr. DeRouen], also by Secretary Wallace and by Secretary Ickes, that arrangements were being made whereby they would segregate the grazing lands of this country into one department. Has that been accomplished up to this time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not vet.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman figure that the Secretary of Agriculture and Secretary of the Interior, with the assistance of the President, are going to consummate that proposal as they said they would do a year ago?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think they are trying to work that out now. We have not appropriated any money for them yet. They have not had a dollar. That bill of mine which was passed and signed on the 29th of last June has not had a dollar appropriated for it to carry out the provisions of the law, so they have not got it working effectively yet. They are working on it. They have held meetings in all of the Western States. They have 90 grazing districts under a process of being organized right now.

Mr. RICH. I think this is a subject well worth while spending a moment upon, and I think the gentleman is interested. I am interested not because I want to see it go to the Department of the Interior or to the Department of Agriculture. I am interested in putting the grazing on public lands into one department so that it can be handled efficiently and economically.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is interested as I am in having an orderly use and conservation and development of our public domain rather than in having it exploited and destroyed.

Mr. RICH. Exactly so. I am interested because Secretary Wallace said that he would not object to it, and Secretary Ickes made the same statement, and with the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the bill, and the Chairman of the Public Lands Committee in accord, I hope the gentleman from Colorado will use every influence he possibly can to see that that orderly procedure is arranged for.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am doing the best that I can, but as all gentlemen know, there is more or less jeal-ousy between between departments and between bureaus, and they all want to hold onto what they have jurisdiction over. It is pretty hard to get them to consolidate.

Mr. RICH. That is the point that I am trying to bring out, and I am glad the gentleman spoke of it first. Because of those jealousies, and because of the unethical procedure of doing things in not a good business way, we Members of the House should use our influence to see that those particular things are consummated, because the taxpayers back home must pay the bill of department extravagance. I see here that we have contributed for grazing under the Department of the Interior the sum of $365,080.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no.

Mr. RICH. That is for division of grazing control, $111,080.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no.

Mr. RICH. And for the expenses of a man here in the District $5,000, and for automobiles $250,000. A year ago we were told we were not going to expend any great sums for this particular activity in the Interior Department. If we are going to spend $365,080 in the Interior Department for grazing, goodness knows the amount we are spending in the Agricultural Department is much greater, and we are adding to these expenses, and each year they will increase, and I do hope that the gentleman will try to bring his influence to bear on segregating grazing in the Department of the Interior and the Agricultural Department, because the heads of these Departments say they are now in accord, and if we ever allow it to get out of this administration, God knows we will never have it accomplished.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I sympathize with the gentleman, but the gentleman is wrong in his figures. The total amount authorized in this bill for the first time is $250,000.

Mr. RICH. I am reading from page 4 of the bill. We are appropriating $111,080 for division of grazing control, and for personal services in the District of Columbia $5,000, and there is $250,000 for automobiles. I take these figures from page 4 of the bill under the division of grazing control.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will read the report and see the set-up and the total amount that is chargeable to the grazing division proper, he will see that the total is $250,000, which includes not to exceed $111,080 for personal services in the District of Columbia and not to exceed $5,000 for the purchase and maintenance of automobiles.

Mr. RICH. That is in the report on page 16, but on page 4 of the bill we contribute $365,080.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is mistaken about that, the total appropriation is $250,000.

Mr. RICH. I want to ask the gentleman one other question. The gentleman says that we have reduced the amount of this bill over $3,000,000 under that requested by the Department.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RICH. A year ago we said that we decreased the Interior Department $17,000,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RICH. But then we have spent in the Interior Department through other organizations or agencies like the P. W. A., the C. C. C., and so forth, over $34,000,000 more; yet we claim a saving for the Department, and what are we doing this year so far as the Interior Department is concerned in the expenditure of funds from those other agencies?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. When Congress passes a bill, awarding a lump sum for relief work and the relief of unemployment and turns it over to the executive department of the Government to allocate and apply, we are not responsible for what they do.

I need not tell the gentleman that. Now, it is true the Secretary of the Interior is the head of the Public Works Administration. That Public Works Administration has allocated enormous sums of money, but that is not a part of the current running expenses of the Department itself. This bill does not provide for anything in the way of construction except a few roads and one other minor item which I have forgotten, but there is practically no construction in this entire bill.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman does not know what these alphabetical organizations are going to spend and what for?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. If we pass that $4,000,-000,000 I apprehend the Interior Department will get a large amount of it and it will be appropriated to Indians, to the national parks, reclamation, roads, Geological Survey, and a dozen other activities. There are 25 activities in the Interior Department, but this committee has nothing to do with that.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate that, and I remember that a year ago, when we discussed this particular phase, the gentleman felt that the money that was expended on these public works and various organizations should be expended through the Interior Department. With the knowledge which the gentleman has as chairman of this committee, the gentleman is better able to allocate those funds in his department than if they were being expended by someone who has not given the proper time and attention to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The trouble is that we do not have that authority. I admit what the gentleman says.

Mr. RICH. That is the point I want to make. I think that money ought to be expended through the recommendations of the gentleman's committee and not by someone appointed by Executive order or someone at the head of the P. W. A. who would not spend the money in orderly procedure. I claim that is the wrong way for us to spend these funds and that they should go through the gentleman's committee. Men who have had experience, as the gentleman has, and who know conditions in the Interior Department, should have charge of the spending of this money. I hope the administration will allocate these funds to the Department of the Interior to be spent by the committee appointed by Congress to look after these things, rather than by selecting some individual, regardless of who he may be, to spend the money as he sees fit.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The trouble about it is the law provides otherwise, and we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. RICH. We should change the law so that orderly procedure would be followed out. We should have never passed the bill giving the President $4,880,000,000 to spend without designating what it should be used for.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Just for a question; yes.

Mr. MILLARD. I listened to the colloquy between the gentleman from Colorado and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] on yesterday with reference to the percentage repaid of the amounts due. I look at page 105 of the hearings, which is "Status of construction account repayment", and it says, "balance repayment contract deferred, $152,-009,000." How much of that was the moratorium granted by Congress?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There was a moratorium granted on the whole thing last year. There was one general, omnibus, horizontal moratorium for a year.

Mr. MILLARD. Was there not a moratorium in 1931, also?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; there was. But let me call attention to the fact that on the page to which the gentleman refers there are 24 Government reclamation projects. Ten of those 24 are paid 100 percent; 8 more are paid over 99 percent. The total average of all payments on all reclamation projects to the United States at the present time is 98.6 percent.

Mr. MILLARD. But the gentleman has not yet told me what has been deferred by the moratorium.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman will find a full statement of the matter on page 104 of the hearings.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is it not true that after 4 years' payments for construction costs the amount deferred by way of moratorium must be paid, and there is an interest charge upon the actual moratorium amount?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time for general debate to the ranking member of the minority [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that I need say very much about this bill, as it has been so very capably covered by the chairman of the committee. It has been a delight for us on the minority to have served under the chairmanship of this man who personifies, to my mind, courtesy, courage, and rounded legislative experience. He is here for his four-teenth term. As the gentleman started out to tell you, he represented the peak of America; may I say that we have some pride in our district, as the gentleman finished high school in Leavenworth, Kans., the district I represent, while his father was the first legislator elected from Rooks County, in my State. On his route to the heights of Colorado, we helped him along the way. [Applause.]

I have enjoyed the companionship and association and expert assistance of Governor Scrugham, who is an engineer and who knows all about mines and mining and reclamation projects; also the fine enthusiasm of the gentleman from Washington, Mr. Zioncheck, of Seattle, who is close to the parks and close to Alaska, as close as he can be and be here; and Mr. Jacobsen, of the majority, who is very patient and constant in his work; Mr. Johnson of Oklahoma, who is majoring on Indian affairs, since he comes from the State where one-third of them reside. He is a worthy successor on this committee to Mr. Hastings. And to my distinguished colleague, Mr. Wigglesworth, of Massachusetts, because he is an accountant aside from his other splendid qualifications.

So I will mention only two or three things. If any of the majority members of the committee desire part of the time, we may give you some, as there will only be my colleague, myself, and one other to speak on this side.

There have been general raises in the amounts in this bill all along the line. That is what I want to emphasize. They were held down a year ago because of depressed conditions and the economic wave, but now we have loosened up a little all along the line generally. That is where the largest part of this increase of $11,000,000 appears.

One of the first things we had to face was the proposition of providing an Under Secretary. Now, that is a big thing sometimes; but here is the question that has come before us: They are having Under Secretaries in other departments. We do not know what they do or what the excuse is for their being established, but it is not for us to say that this Department cannot have an Under Secretary if the others are going to have one. Anyway, it is demoralizing to stand up and fight one new man on the pay roll when thousands are being put on without any legislative sanction whatever.

The half of this total appropriation is for the care of the Indians and the operation of the Wheeler-Howard bill that was finally agreed to on the last day of the session. It has been my observation that when a thing is agreed to on the last day of any session it may be looked upon with some suspicion as not having been fully considered; but it is the law of the land and we must accept it as such. I shall not discuss it at this time, but probably before this bill passes the Senate the Committee on Indian Affairs will repass upon the question of a policy to be pursued in the care of the Indians. Some provisions of the Wheeler-Howard Act are fine; they were idealistic. Some other provisions were not so well received by the sound judgment of sober men. It seems an iridescent dream and backward that they should return to tribal ownership, but that is only the final objective. As I say, our big increase outside of the general level has been for the administration of Indian affairs under the Wheeler-Howard bill, and we allowed only about half what the Budget agreed on; but the whole policy is a matter that must be decided again by the House and the Senate before the session ends.

The big item in the Indian affairs was the school proposition. This was debated at great length, particularly the nonreservation boarding schools. We accept the proposition; and we urge in all sincerity, of course, the need of maintaining these boarding schools as they now are. In some instances they were curtailed too far; but, after all, it is more or less a local commercial urge that is emphasizing their maintenance. I have seen the growth of the public schools about the reservations in Kansas; I have seen the great improvement that has come about in the rural schools. elementary and secondary, within the last 10 or 20 years, and this affords a fair excuse for reducing these nonreservation boarding schools. It is the policy of neither the committee nor of the Bureau to reduce them further at this time. The reason for their curtailment was partly in the interest of economy. In all fairness it should be said that this policy was not inaugurated by this administration but was instituted by Commissioner Rhoads under the other national administration, and Commissioner Collier is in accord with and carrying out the policy.

Big expenditures have been made for roads on Indian reservations. It has been my observation that none of the money spent during the last 2 years has proved more satisfactory in its results than the money spent for roads in the Central West and the West. So when we spend money for improving roads in Indian reservations we are spending it about as well as it can be spent for them outside of increasing their educational facilities and improving the public health. We have done these three things on the reservations.

As I say, we have emphasized the advantage of spending money for roads, and the appropriation for this purpose has been increased materially. I think this is about as fine a thing as we could do in the national parks. The national park system is attracting the attention of the country. Good roads allow people to reach these parks by automobile, for the parks are not on the main-line railroads, and all of them cannot be reached easily; but with the facility of good roads the people will come more and more to use the parks, and we will wean them away from going to Europe for their vacations and teach them the wonders and beauty of our own land.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Has the subcommittee appropriated any money for additional parks?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. No.

Mr. SHORT. That work is being done under the publicworks program.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. We have not appropriated anything for any new parks. There is an appropriation for national monuments that has been set aside. It is very small. There are about 67 different national monuments that are outstanding scenic spots that are not big enough to be called parks.

Mr. SHORT. Does the subcommittee determine where the money shall be spent or is it spent on the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. No; we act on our own initiative in all things pertaining to the Interior Department, I assure the Several institutions in the District of Columbia have been placed under the Interior Department, among them St. Elizabeths Hospital, which takes care of the insane of the District and Indians from the reservations. There is a feeling, however, that the facilities of this institution are being abused by people of Maryland and Virginia; that they impose on the District of Columbia. I wish there were some way a real investigation could be made to determine the residence of many of the patients. It would be found that many of them come from Maryland and Virginia.

We have also taken care of Howard University, the great colored university of America, Freedmen's Hospital, and the Columbia Institute for the Blind.

In closing I want to emphasize two things: I served temporarily on the committee conducting the hearings on the independent offices bill in December. The two things which I stressed then I emphasize again. They have impressed me as being very important. I do not suppose my suggestions will be absorbed any more than water on the back of a duck. but, if I keep at it long enough and somebody else agrees with me, we may get somewhere eventually.

First of all, we ought to have a representative of the Appropriations Committee sit in on the Budget hearings. It is the President's Budget, of course, but, after all, it is only a recommendation to us. There are no printed hearings of the President's Budget. They say thus and so and we do not know why it was thus and so. We have not had a member sit in and listen to the proceedings. I therefore believe there ought to be a representative from each subcommittee sit in with the Budget and at least know why they reached certain conclusions. I think that could be arranged if we were interested enough in doing so. There ought to be some liaison between these two recommending groups.

My other recommendation is this: There are in the Appropriations Committee high-class, well-paid men, who serve regardless of changes of administration. They are in there and are kept because of their usefulness and their service. These men ought to be allowed to go into these various bureaus, in my opinion, between sessions, and investigate them, just like the Members would, although these men could do it better than we can because they know the situation. They know the institutions that come under their direction, and I think it ought to be arranged so that they could visit these institutions and bureaus and bring back to seen in the past, construction authorized even in the face of us first-hand information on what ought to be done. I submit those two recommendations and believe they would help materially the matter of appropriating wisely. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Wigglesworth].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I, too, am glad to express my appreciation of the consideration which the minority members of this subcommittee have received from the majority members. I am indebted in this connection to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado, the acting majority leader of this House, Mr. TAYLOR, and to each and every member of the majority side on the subcommittee.

This bill, as you appreciate, is very wide in its scope. Its scope has been added to this year as a result of legislation already referred to, providing for grazing control, for the construction of roads, for action under the Wheeler-Howard Act in the field of Indian affairs, and by the transfer of additional activities.

The bill, as the report indicates, carries a total sum of about $59,000,000-$58,775,656-which is in excess of the sum carried in the bill last year by about $12,000,000-$11,910,790.62-but less than the sum recommended by the Bureau of the Budget by more than $3,000,000-$3,279,409.

The principal items of increases will be found on page 2 of the committee report. There are about eight items there, aggregating some $12,500,000. If you will subtract from that total two nonrecurrent items, amounting to about $882,000. and a further item of $1,500,000 carried in the bill a year ago for the petroleum administration but omitted this year because of the fact that the applicable legislation has been found by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional, you will find that the $12,000,000 increase has been accounted for except for about $1,700,000. The balance is distributed through the many items in this bill, being in part reflected in additional activities transferred to the Department of the Interior, such, for example, as the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going into these increases in detail. The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. TAYLOR, has covered the situation thoroughly, and there will be ample opportunity under the 5-minute rule to go into any details which are not fully understood. I want to make just three or four general observations.

The members of the committee who were here during the last Congress will recall the action taken in respect to the so-called "permanent appropriations", automatic annual appropriations amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. Action was taken with a view to bringing these appropriations insofar as possible, under the annual supervision of Congress. Action was also taken with a view to realizing substantial savings in the total appropriations. In this bill the committee will find a large number of these appropriations which appear here for the first time. They aggregate something like $2,000,000. They have been brought under the annual control of this House and some savings have resulted. I am confident that as we go on, further and substantial savings will prove possible in the national interest. May I express the hope at this time that the members of this committee will cooperate with the members of the Appropriations Committee in combating the tendency which always manifests itself to create additional appropriations of permanent character.

Mr. Chairman, it has been pointed out that there is no new construction provided for in this bill except such as is represented in the items for road construction. The reason for this under existing policy is, of course, clear. I think, however, that we should also recognize its significance. It means, of course, that any items for construction which should properly be carried in the Interior Department bill will not be reflected in its total. It means that any Member of this House who desires to obtain construction within this field of the Government must obtain that construction by petition to executive officials in charge of emergency funds rather than through legislative action. It means that the Congress has no control whatsoever over construction items for the Interior Department. It means that we may see, as we have definite disapproval by one body in this Congress or the other. It means that to the extent that emergency funds are placed under Executive control, we are continuing a system of two-fold appropriation, executive officials having the power to negative action taken by the House and Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point certain tables showing the total emergency funds which have been made available to the Interior Department.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEALEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I have placed these tables in the Record in the light of the discussion on the floor yesterday resulting from the statement by the very able Representative, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin]. The Members will notice that the tables indicate that there had been expended as of September 30 last, by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the purpose of rentals and benefits, for the removal of surplus and for administration expenses in this connection, the sum of $504,714,486.53. The money was, of course, spent under the general policy of the Department of Agriculture with a view to reducing surplus in the hope of increasing the purchasing power of the farmer.

In contrast with this policy the evidence before the committee indicates that the total value of crops grown on reclamation projects in this country since 1906 has amounted to approximately $2,000,000,000. It further indicates that the Public Works Administration has made available for reclamation work and similar purposes through the Indian Service to the extent of $6,139,000 and through the Reclamation Service in respect of 41 projects to the extent of $105,-390,000, or a total of $111,529,000.

I may add that if I am correctly advised, there has been no congressional consideration or approval of 18 of the 41 projects referred to.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman referred a moment ago to the fact that a great deal of the construction work that has been conducted by the Department of the Interior has been made from funds not appropriated directly for that purpose by this Congress. It is true, is it not, that there is to be constructed shortly a new building for the Department of the Interior, which is also to be financed out of these so-called "emergency appropriations?"

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I assume that if the building is constructed it will be financed out of such funds as may be made available under the $4,800,000,000 bill now under consideration by the Senate or such other legislation of emergency character as may be enacted into law.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is it not also a fact that the Members of the Congress have had no opportunity to determine where such buildings should be placed or to determine whether their intended location is in the right place according to the plans that have been formulated in the past for the general arrangement of buildings in Washington?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Under existing policy that seems to be taken entirely out of the hands of Congress.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman think that Congress should have the power to determine the location of these new buildings in order to carry out, consistently, the general plan for the development of the Capital City?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the Congress should have that power, just as I think it should have power in respect to the expenditure involved in the construction of such buildings.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. We have expended millions of dollars for the development of the so-called "Triangle project", assuming it would bear a certain relationship to the development of the city in the future; and now, as I understand it, the Secretary of the Interior, without any specific authority from Congress, utilizing emergency funds, is to construct a Department building which bears no relationship at all to the general plan that it was intended the city should follow in its future growth.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have inserted certain figures in the Record for the purpose of emphasizing the fact, as I see it, that two of the great departments of this Government are moving in inconsistent, if not opposite, directions; also for the purpose of emphasizing the further fact that the people of this country have been called upon for over $504,000,000 for the purpose of reducing surplus, while at the same time they have been called upon for over $111,000,000 for the purpose, among others, of increasing that surplus. I emphasize also the fact that Congress has, in large measure, tied its own hands in respect of both policies, delegating its normal powers to the executive branch of the Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. I am just wondering if the gentleman realizes that we lost our foreign market largely through putting up the tariff walls after the World War for the benefit of the eastern manufacturers and that this $111,000,000, which the gentleman so deeply regrets we are spending for irrigation works, is a permanent investment that will be of use in the years to come, and is not wasted.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Without attempting to discuss the causes contributing to the loss of our foreign markets, I may say to my colleague that I am not endeavoring either to criticize or to approve the reclamation policy to which he refers. At one time or another I have been in every State of the Union. I have a great regard for the gentleman's State. I am, of course, anxious to see his State and every other State prosper. The point which I make is that one great department appears to be pursuing one policy while another great department pursues a contrary or inconsistent policy. It is difficult to reach the conclusion that both of these policies can be right.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other fact to which brief reference may be made. The evidence submitted to the committee demonstrates clearly that an increase in the cost of living is in process and that a further increase is anticipated during the next fiscal year. I shall not go into detail. The committee will find in the hearings estimated increases in the price of fuel to the extent of 22 percent, of food to the extent of from 15 to 20 percent, of paper to the extent of 16 percent—of a substantial increase in the general cost of living. A substantial part of the increase carried in this bill is explained in this way. The Government is no exception to the rule that all must meet the burden resulting from the general increase in the cost of living which is in prospect.

One other word, Mr. Chairman, in closing: The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum] suggested some time ago the advisability of closer cooperation, more especially when Congress is not in session, between the appropriations subcommittees and the various units, the expenditures of which it is their duty to supervise and control.

The suggestion is one which, in my judgment, merits the serious consideration of the leadership of this House and the House as a whole.

If Members will study the bill under consideration closely, they will find some of the difficulties by which a subcommittee is confronted. They will find included not only ordinary funds but emergency funds, cooperative funds from the several State private funds, and funds under appropriations heretofore of permanent character. They will find lack of uniformity in reports as between different units requesting funds. They will find 12 pages of closely written transfers which play their part in the figures in this bill. In these times, when so many questions of vital importance are before the Congress, it is particularly difficult for the Appropriations Committee to exercise effective control.

I believe that if proper arrangement could be made for cooperation between representatives of the subcommittees and the various units which they regulate, especially during the periods when Congress is not in session, we should all of us be surprised at the substantial savings which would be realized in the interest of the taxpayers of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon some remarks were made which, I think, should be corrected in the discussion of this bill. I wish to point out to our distinguished chairman and other members of the committee that I have been a resident of Colorado. I know something about what takes place on the frontier. I know what that piece of Scripture meant when it said that the young men returned to the wells of their fathers and cleaned them out to the end that their livestock might have water. I know what water is in a desert country. I know what water means to those hidden valleys in the Rocky Mountains which I have learned to love. At the same time I have in mind the great sacrifices of those great spirits who have developed the West, and who are out there today with their increasing families, more intensely farming the limited acres they have to the end that there may be homes for an increasing population, and I cannot overlook the great forces which have been set in motion in this country during the last 2 or 3 years insofar as the acres of land and the production of food and processing taxes and N. R. A., and the trouble with railroads and our waterways and trucks and overland transportation are concerned.

In looking through this report I find, as has been stated, some $105,000,000 devoted to providing water for hungry acres through the P. W. A. Certain products are being produced in those irrigated valleys which are highly competitive with the crops being grown in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and other States east of the Mississippi. I have the greatest respect anyone could have for the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor]. He made the statement yesterday afternoon:

Our principal crops compete scarcely at all with the farm crops of any other parts of our country. Our range cattle and sheep and our sugar beets and alfalfa do not at all affect the farmers of the rest of the country any more than the cotton and tobacco of the South affect us.

The remarks which I intend to make have to do with something that Colorado perhaps is interested in more than in any other crop grown there, and that is the production of sugar. In the Western States there are something like 8 to 12 million bags of sugar produced for which there is no home market in the territory where the sugar is consumed. That sugar moves into Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, to the great detriment of the beet growers in the Western States and of the growers in Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana, and to the people of this country who now pay processing taxes in order to provide for parity payments. That excess sugar is largely dumped into the eastern territory on a special rebate basis to the tune of millions and millions and millions of dollars' worth, and is tending to crucify not only the beet growers in these western valleys where this money is used to provide water, but to do likewise to the growers in the Eastern States.

If it were not for the farmers and the Government and the triple A and the consumers interested in processing taxes and benefit payments and parity payments, these remarks would not be in order. However, this money is appropriated to provide water to increase production per acre. At Toledo, Ohio, there are 2,000 farmers begging for the privilege of growing 20,000 acres of beets on farms that have been highly developed and that require P. W. A. funds or general appropriations to provide water. At Owosso, Mich., there are 2,000 farmers who are asking for 20,000 acres possibly. At Croswell, Mich., are another thousand who are begging for another 10,000 acres of beets. Those farmers are being denied the right to grow those acres of beets and provide sugar that would move in markets 50 to 100 miles from the point of production, while here we spent $105,000,000 in western valleys to provide water for increased production so that sugar from that production may move into eastern territory to be distributed largely through the two big chain stores, and on a secret rebate and specialprice basis which helps to crucify the little independent retail stores who feed the people when they are not able to pay cash for the time being, which the chain stores will not do.

This question of providing more water so that more crops can be produced is related to the restriction of acres and production of food products, and is related to the fact that millions of box cars flow from East to West loaded and must come back, and those very box cars seek tons of freight moving east at a rate entirely out of line with rates charged in eastern territory, and that forces the farmers and the shippers in the eastern territory to pay a freight rate unreasonably high when compared to the low freight cost on the long-haul concentrated farm products moving eastward from far-away western fields. If the rails make an unreasonably low rate eastward and thereby incur a loss on the haul, the eastern farmers' rates are raised to help make up the loss of the railroads on the long haul from the West. There is no consistency in such a program. It is unfair to the farmers in the East and unfair to the farmers in the West. These new artificial forces which have been put to work by the A. A. A. and the P. W. A. and the N. R. A. with increasing costs and retirement of acreage, and allocation of production, and consolidation of transportation agencies, makes it necessary for us to debate these matters to the end that we may think more clearly on the problem as a whole. The farmers of the West are as vitally interested as those of the East. It all has to do with production and control thereof. We have coming up in a few days the bill H. R.

It has to do with parity prices and payments of processing taxes. Mr. Chester Davis only yesterday morning submitted testimony which ties in to the very problem of further providing more water, not for more acres but for more production on the acres which are to be cultivated. For instance, when we refer to pages 107 and 110 of the report, we find Dr. Mead making statements like this:

The money for these reservoirs has been allotted. We are building three of them and have prepared plans for the fourth.

Our distinguished chairman said a few moments ago that he did not know what would happen under the works program, if it goes through. Suppose they take a hundred million dollars of the public-works money, or five hundred million, or eight hundred million, and go out there and build new reservoirs and impound more water and raise more crops. I know what it means when those mountains are without snow. I know what it means when those reservoirs are without water, and I know what it means when they approach the spring planting time. I know the discouragement that exists when snow is not on the mountains on the 1st of April and when the reservoirs have been emptied by the water having been used at the end of the previous year.

On the other hand, I know the joy that runs through the life of those people when the mountains are covered with snow and the reservoirs are full of water and when those wonderful crops are growing on the irrigated lands. It is a question of so-called "overproduction." I think it is underconsumption, but they call it "overproduction." It is a question of the Government stepping in and saying, "You cannot produce on your land the things that that land will produce." It is a question of handing over $4,800,000,000 to be dished out under the pressure of this particular group or that particular group or some other group. It is a question of the East conflicting with the West, the West conflicting with the South. It is a question of railroads without proper revenue and without compensatory rates.

Dr. Mead, speaking further, said this:

Federal irrigation today is largely a rescue agency.

We have so many rescue agencies today that they are all in conflict. They are running at counter purposes. Certainly it is a rescue agency, but providing a crop that Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana farmers can raise is a rescue agency for the eastern farmer just the same as this money is a rescue agency in providing water for the western irrigationist. Dr. Mead thinks in terms of rescuing his irrigationists and I think in terms of my farmers first and the whole country secondly. I am not speaking against the production of sugar in this country. We are producing only 26 percent in continental United States of what we consume. We are importing 74 percent, and the principal part of it comes from the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and from Hawaii. A great part comes from Cuba, but the farmers in Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, where many mills now stand, want the privilege of growing sugar beets to the capacity of those mills, and they should not be denied that right. They want to grow them because those sugar beets are at the point of consumption. They are not 1,500 miles away from a consuming market. They do not need P. W. A. funds to provide water for the growing of the beets.

You cannot grow bulk crops in the mountain valleys and ship them East to points of consumption without a loss. Those shipments have to be concentrated products. What do I mean by "concentrated products"? I mean beef on the hoof. I mean sugar in the bag. Hay grown out there is consumed on the spot. The beet tops are consumed on the spot. The dried beet pulp or the wet pulp is consumed on the spot. It is not put into cars and shipped eastward; while in the East the beet tops and the sugar and the beef is consumed. You say, "Are you going to cut those people off from living?" No. The new forces would take those people bodily and drag them off to other points in the United States. We all know the "planned economy" program calls for great shifts of our population, for the retirement of marginal lands, for the breaking up of homes. It is all so very far-reaching that we should very seriously consider the whole plan before starting to pull up stakes.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. What would you do now? Hay is being loaded in Oregon to feed you people back there right now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I had my way about it I would produce to the limit in farms and in factories. I would ship that surplus product to the rest of the world at any price at which the starving millions would buy it. I would produce all I could in western Colorado and in these other States, and I would produce it in the Eastern States. In other words, I believe in the economy of abundance and not in the economy of scarcity.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Where did the gentleman live in Colorado?

Mr. CRAWFORD. At Denver.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. How long did the gentleman live there?

Mr. CRAWFORD. For several months.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Several months.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. How long since the gentleman has been there?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It has been about 9 years.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman's idea is that in order to relieve a condition in Michigan he would like to have the greatest industry in Colorado—namely, the sugarbeet industry—suspend operation? Do I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir; not at all. I call attention to H. R. 5585. If you will take that and analyze it, and if you will analyze the statements of Mr. Davis before the Committee on Agriculture made this very week, the gentleman will find exactly what I am driving at.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Just what is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. CRAWFORD. My suggestion is that until this restriction program is over with, we discontinue appropriating funds for the purpose of the production of concentrated food products in the western territory while at the same time we are denying the eastern farmers the right to operate farms which they have operated down through the years and which have been developed for 50 years, and which do not require the appropriations of $105,000,000 or more millions to give water to the end that more crops may be produced when acreage is being retired.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I would like to ask what appropriation for irrigation in Colorado the gentleman refers to? Mr. CRAWFORD. I am referring to the $105,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Where is the $105,000,000 in

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me clear the gentleman's mind on this, the products I am talking about are coming from Colorado, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, and California. They move down the coast, through the Panama Canal. They permeate this country through the Warrior and Mississippi Rivers. They go through the New York Barge Canal. They come in direct competition with the products produced in Michigan, Ohio, and those States contiguous.

If it is to be a planned economy, why not put those products where they will not crucify the other farmers of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, can he tell us how much according to his information has been granted for irrigation projects in Colorado?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not a question of localizing this to any little particular project.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. But the gentleman referred to

Mr. CRAWFORD. I referred to Colorado because the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee stated that none of their crops came into direct competition with crops of the East.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Does not the gentleman know that the amount of sugar produced in the United States is far less than the amount consumed?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I so stated awhile ago.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman has not yet answered my question as to how much money is spent for irrigation in Colorado, or how much is allocated for irrigation projects in Colorado under this bill or through any other governmental project.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I lived in Colorado once and even helped locate some of these irrigation projects.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Did the gentleman spend more than 5 months in Colorado?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It does not matter how long a person spent in a State if he is informed. The damage is being done in the Eastern States where the western product is being sold under special and secret rebates, thus destroying independent merchants and price structures on farm products.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman has not answered my question. He said he knew something about Colorado. He said he lived there several months about 9 years ago. Some of us have lived there 30 or 40 years continuously and think we know something about our State. Our Colorado farmers who are producing sugar beets are raising them on lands which also have been developed for 5, 10, 15, 20, and 50 years. All money now being spent for irrigation works in Colorado is to supplement existing water supply for lands now and for many years under cultivation and not to bring new acreage under cultivation.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, the remark I made a few minutes ago when the gentleman from Colorado was addressing the Committee to the effect that from the questions asked it was apparent that many Members of the House had an erroneous conception of Alaska, to the extent of about 100 percent, was not intended as a reflection on anyone, for a man may travel through Alaska under certain conditions and circumstances and when he comes out, although he has exercised ordinary intelligence while he was there, he would not know much more about Alaska than he did before he went in. The implication behind the question seemed to have been that we would be better off if we gave Alaska back to Russia or turned it over to China or simply gave it its independence; that the country as a whole would be farther ahead if Alaska were not a part of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit an observation, he ought not to feel so very lonesome, because the inference from much of what has been said on the floor on the bill against reclamation seems to be that the entire western United States ought to be ceded back to France and Mexico, that it is not worth anything, that it is a national liability, and we ought to wish it off on the people we bought it from.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield. Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman made the statement that a man could travel Alaska from one end to the other and not know anything about it. I do not quite understand it. Will the gentleman explain his statement?

Mr. DIMOND. My time, of course, is limited, but I may explain it this way: A man could go from the banquet of one chamber of commerce to the banquet of another in Alaska and really not know very much about the Territory; whereas another man, like the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], would really see the country and understand what he saw not only of Alaska as Alaska but of Alaska as a part of the United States.

The statement was made a moment ago-and I want to correct it—that there are some 18,000 or 19,000 white people in Alaska. It is not quite as bad as that. The white population of Alaska is something in excess of 29,000. One very encouraging thing about the last report of the collector of customs for Alaska was that it showed an increase in the population of Alaska last year by 1,100 people, by immigration alone. This is the greatest increase in immigration in any one year we have had since the World War. We used to have plenty more people in Alaska, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] said. We had 100,000 white people in Alaska at one time, but a number of circumstances dragged the number down. One was the conservation policy of the Government, and I am not saying anything against it, but it had a very direct bearing on population. In 1906 this Government entered upon a new policy with relation to its public lands and a necessary effect of that policy was to some extent to tend to a depopulation of the Territory. Another thing that had a serious effect was the World War. Alaska provided more soldiers for the Army and more men for the Navy during the war in proportion to population, both white and native, than any other part of the United States; and that is not at all strange, because a large part of the population of Alaska at that time was made up of young and adventurous men; and as soon as war was declared they did not stop and wait to be drafted; they did not enlist in Alaska because they were afraid the war would be over before they got into it, but these men went to the other States, and New York, Maryland, and other States got the credit for the enlistment of many of Alaska's men, young men who were the very lifeblood of that Territory and necessary for its economic expansion. After their experiences in the war they did not come back. We are now, however, on the upgrade.

It is said Alaska does not amount to anything economically? I have in my hand the report of the Commission to study the proposed highway to Alaska, acting under an act of Congress. In order to show the justification for this great project the Commission says this-and I hope it will be given such weight as it is entitled to:

The study of population alone does not give a true picture of the commercial and industrial importance of the Territory, especially during the intensive mechanization that has characterized gold-producing and fishing industries in recent years, resulting in the general use of machines to replace manpower. In normal years the average value of merchandise shipped to Alaska is from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 and exports, including gold and silver, from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000, giving a substantial balance of trade in favor of the Territory. From these figures, taken from the Government reports, it is seen that there are produced each year and exported from Alaska commodities to the value of from $800 to $1,300 for every man, woman, and child permanently residing in the Territory. If the United States as a whole could produce at the same rate per capita, we would have the enormous exportable surplus of over $100,000,000,000 per year.

Mr. Chairman, that is not millions of dollars: It is $109,000,000,000 that would be produced by the United States if the United States, in proportion to population, produced as much as Alaska.

The most important products of Alaska, of course, are gold and copper and fish. You may ask, why is there not greater wealth in Alaska now, and why are there not more white people residing permanently in Alaska? I have said before on this floor and I repeat that the trouble with Alaska at the present time is what was formerly called in Europe "absentee landlordism." The people who own the greater part of the wealth of Alaska or who take to themselves the greater part of the wealth of Alaska, and they take it partly by reason of investment of capital and energy and partly by something not so commendable, live not in Alaska, but in the United States; so that all of the vast wealth produced in Alaska in the past and all of the vast wealth reserved for future years has gone and will go under the present set-up, not to residents of Alaska, but to people who live in the United States, and those people are spread all over the United States. We have a great copper mine in Alaska-

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield to the gentleman from New York.
Mr. SIROVICH. Is it not a fact that four organizations like the California Packers, the Alaska Packers, Libby, McNeil & Libby, and the A. & P. Co. through traps which they have in Alaska take away about 55 percent of the salmon caught up there every year?

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give the exact figures to the gentleman, but I believe his statement is substantially correct.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. MICHENER. On the question of wealth produced, how much of it is fish?

Mr. DIMOND. Half of it or probably more than half.

Mr. MICHENER. The people who produce that do not live there. They go up there in boats, get what they want, and come away.

Mr. SIROVICH. And do not even employ the natives.

Mr. DIMOND. I am coming to fish by and by.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan referred to the Alaskan Railroad, and I want to touch upon that before I take up the fishing question. It has been intimated or suggested that outside of fishing we have not anything in the Territory. That is not correct. Alaska has produced in the past between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000 in gold alone, and judging by the present outlook—judging by the prospects we have and the knowledge of gold-bearing ground we have to some extent developed—Alaska will produce in the next 50 years at least $500,000,000 more in gold.

We may leave out of consideration for the present the tin. nickel, copper, and the other minerals of Alaska. Its coal alone is almost exhaustless. Leaving all that out of consideration, the gold alone of Alaska has justified the expenditure of every dollar that has been spent there. Expenditures of the Government have been justified by the gold production in the past, and doubly so by what we know it is going to produce in gold in the future. Of course, the Territory lately has been aided by the gold policy of the administration in increasing the price of gold from $20.67 to $35 an ounce. This permits greater profit from known gold-bearing bodies. and it also permits the working of what we used to call the low-grade ground. As you may understand, we have vast areas that could not be mined when gold was $20.67 per ounce, but may be mined at a substantial profit at $35 an ounce. That is one of the reasons why our population has increased 1,100 through immigration in the past year. The my attention to it.

people are going into the gold regions. Now, I hope that 10,000 people will not go to Alaska expecting to find employment in the gold mines. A certain limited number can obtain work, as there is bound to be an increase in employment along this line, but not many.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MEAD in the chair). All time has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to continue for an additional 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] that the time for general debate has been fixed by the House. The Chair may suggest that the gentleman can move to strike out the last word when the first paragraph of the bill is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, namely:

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, some question has arisen about the Alaskan Railroad, and evidently it is thought that we should abandon the railroad in that it is economically a failure. May I say that as compared with the transcontinental railroads in the United States, the Alaskan Railroad even at this time is an outstanding success. Remember that when the transcontinental railroads were built thousands and thousands of acres of land lying along the rights-of-way of the railroads were given to the railroad companies, land that at the present time is worth probably in excess of a billion dollars. We must remember, too, that not one of these railroads has continued in life until the present time without a loss to the investors in each of them totaling hundreds of millions of dollars, through failures, bankruptcies, if bankruptcy applies to them, and receiverships and reorganizations. We had an example not long ago in the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, and I suppose it would not be an exaggeration to say that the losses to the stockholders and bondholders of actual money invested in that railroad would be in excess of $100,000,000. It may be said that, after all, the Government was not involved in this, and that this money came out of the pockets of the investors or the people who bought stock in these corporations. This is true, but where does the Government get its money except from the taxes of the people?

Therefore, even though the Alaskan Railroad has cost $71,000,000, and even though you are about to appropriate, I assume, $250,000 to cover its deficit for the coming year, as compared with the other railroads, with all their reorganization and graft and receivership and losses of hundreds of millions of dollars to the people, I say again that the Alaska Railroad is the outstanding success in continental railroad building in these United States.

Let us also look to the future. Do not let us keep our eyes glued to just the square of ground ahead of us. Let us look to the future, and judging from what Alaska has done in the past, in the future it is going to be the most valuable asset of the United States, bar none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes; I yield gladly to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am sure every Member of the House present appreciates the gentleman's interesting and informative address. I am wondering if the gentleman would care to discuss the proposal to build a highway from the United States to Alaska, and state whether he thinks this would help the situation economically and otherwise in Alaska.

Mr. DIMOND. I shall be pleased to do that, Mr. Chairman, and I am glad the gentleman from Oklahoma has called my attention to it.

About twelve hundred miles intervene between the northernmost point of the road system of Canada and the road system of Alaska, the Richardson Highway, to which I am now pointing. If this could be connected up, and I am pointing now to about the place to which the road is built, at Hazleton, British Columbia, by going through British Columbia, through the Yukon Territory, and through the city of Dawson, and then west to the Richardson Highway, a little south of Fairbanks, Alaska would be really made accessible to the people of the United States to an extent which is not possible at the present time. After all, the old coveredwagon spirit has not entirely disappeared from our people here, except instead of traveling by horses and mules and oxen they now go by automobiles.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. As I understand, the major part of the proposed highway would be in Canada, would it not?

Mr. DIMOND. That is quite true, five-sixths of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman any information that he could give the Members as to whether or not the Canadian Government is sufficiently interested in the proposal to build its share of this highway? Mr. DIMOND. In answer to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the Canadian Government has shown an interest in it in the past. Of course, the people of Canada and the governments of Canada, both Dominion and Provincial, are like our own governments—they have not had any too much money in recent years. However, I believe this can be taken care of.

On my way from Alaska to Washington last October I had quite an extended conversation with the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Pattullo, on the subject, and he said, "We want the road, but what are we going to use for money at the present time? It is true we need this road, but we need other roads in British Columbia."

Of course, other roads are needed in Canada.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIMOND. Yes; surely.

Mr. HOEPPEL. It is my opinion, after having lived in Alaska for 10 years, it would be more desirable that we develop Alaska itself and build roads throughout Alaska rather than build a road from Alaska through British territory to Seattle. What does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. DIMOND. No; I think the two ought to go hand in hand. It is true we need more roads in Alaska, and the Alaska Road Commission, which is the Government roadbuilding agency in Alaska, under the Department of the Interior, has set up a program for the expenditure in Alaska at various places, as an extension of its road system, of about $6,000,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 addi-

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. This includes $2,000,000 called for to construct the Alaska end of what is known as the "International Highway" or the "Pacific-Yukon Highway."

I must disagree with my distinguished friend from California. I think the most important thing in the development of Alaska would be the construction of this international highway, and I am happy to know that 3 or 4 days ago the Senate passed a bill calling for the construction of the highway, or looking toward the construction of the highway. which was introduced in the Senate by Senator McNary, of Oregon. I have a similar bill in the House. I hope this legislation will be enacted at the present session. It is worthy of the support of every Member.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. If I understand the gentleman correctly, what he means to tell the House is that what you need in Alaska is people rather than capital.

Mr. DIMOND. Precisely.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. Certainly.
Mr. COLDEN. May I ask the gentleman how many months this proposed highway would be open for travel?

Mr. DIMOND. It could be kept open the year round, but it would not be economically wise to do so at first. It can be kept open at very slight expense for 6 months of the year. My friend Slim Williams went over the route two or three winters ago and he said that on this route he never got above timber line and never encountered more than 20 inches of snow. If the road followed the coast, of course, it could not be kept open for anything like that length of time. but as planned it goes back of the Coast Range in the series of valleys that extend southward from Alaska down to Mexico, east of the Coast Range.

Mr. COLDEN. May I ask the gentleman to what extent the lands of Alaska are suitable for homesteading and farming and in what part of Alaska these lands are situated?

Mr. DIMOND. The total area of Alaska is about 350,-000,000 acres. A little over 1 percent is covered with ice. The agricultural land in Alaska, as classified by the Bureau of the Census, is 40,000,000 acres. It could easily support a population on the farming lands alone of two or three million, judging by what has been accomplished in Norway, Sweden, and Finland.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Judging by what has been accomplished in Alaska in the way of experimentation by the Department of Agriculture, how many would it support?

Mr. DIMOND. The same number. The gentleman has intimated—I forget his exact language—that Alaska is not suitable for the growth of any crops or produce, but as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Taylor] has said, when we have sunlight for 18 or 20 hours a day our growing season is extended that much longer. Between the 20th of May and the 20th of September we have more sunlight daily in Alaska than you have in Michigan or Oklahoma, and of course, if you have that much more sunlight and maintain the same warm temperature the growing season is that much longer. We grow some of the finest vegetables in the world in Alaska. Dr. Steffanson says that the finest celery in the world is grown at Dawson.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says there are 300,000,000 acres of land in Alaska.

Mr. DIMOND. There are 350,000,000 acres of land in

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. About how many square miles is that?

Mr. DIMOND. Five hundred and ninety thousand square miles. I have a pamphlet here which I think will interest you. It states that the area of Alaska exceeds that of the Thirteen Original States plus Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Of course, a good deal of it is tundra and only fit for the support of reindeer, but we have 40,000,000 acres of agricultural land.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. About what is the mean temperature? Mr. DIMOND. The temperature of the water is about 41 degrees, as the Japan current runs along the whole coast of Alaska and moderates the temperature, just as the Gulf Stream does in Norway.

Now, gold is not the only mineral that is produced in The copper mines have produced $200,000,000 worth of copper, but, owing to the fall in prices by the failure of industry to absorb the copper, the production has fallen off, and now all copper mines in Alaska are closed.

Now, the issue was raised this morning by a question to the gentleman from Colorado as to the importation of people into that Territory to be employed in the fishing industry. That is quite correct.

That is quite correct, and what Mr. TAYLOR said about that is correct. That is one of the troubles with Alaska. If you turn control of the fisheries over to the people of Alaska, to be administered by the Alaska Legislature, the Government here would save two or three hundred thousand dollars that it appropriates every year in order to supervise the fisheries, and we in Alaska would be infinitely better off. Thousands upon thousands of Filipinos and orientals of various kinds are brought into Alaska every year. They do very materially displace the local labor, including the natives, who, I think, ought to be given first call when it comes to employment. That arises from the fact that the fishing companies are largely owned in the United States. It is "absentee landlordism" again. These companies will not take the trouble-they will not make sufficient effort-to employ residents of Alaska, but give preference in employment to people in the United States. That lessens unemployment to that extent in the United States, but in the long run the coast States as well as Alaska will be better off if we had our residents fully employed in the industry and had local control of the fisheries. Just now we are not getting the benefits that we ought to have out of the fisheries.

Another thing this Congress may do, even if it did not give control of the fisheries to the people of Alaska, which would help us Alaskans very materially with respect to fisheries, would be to abolish all fish traps and give the man of small capital who can buy a small boat and a seine a chance to make a living out of the fisheries. As it is now, the big traps catch so much fish that the fishermen of Alaska have not a fair opportunity to make a living out of this industry.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes; gladly.

Mr. MOTT. Is it by reason of the fact that Alaska is a Territory that it is not able to control the fisheries, with regard to employment?

Mr. DIMOND. Precisely. When the organic act was passed for Alaska, as first drafted it contained a provision whereby the Territory could control its fisheries. That provision was lost either in committee or in the House, and nobody has been able since to get any bill even out of committee looking to Territorial control of the fisheries.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman knows how I sympathize with him personally regarding the three or four hundred traps operated by two or three men that catch 55 percent of the fish in Alaska. I introduced a bill before our committee to abolish the traps which would help the natives of Alaska, and still the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Roper, is opposed to the bill. Can the gentleman tell me whether the Alaska people are in sympathy with the bill that I have introduced?

Mr. DIMOND. I can assure the gentleman that the people of Alaska, in my opinion, are 99 percent in sympathy with the object of the bill and with his exact bill. I have received I do not know how many dozen letters from Alaska since the bill was introduced, and in all but one there was no objection to the bill, and the hope was expressed that the bill would be enacted at this session of Congress.

Mr. SIROVICH. Why is the Secretary of Commerce opposed to the bill?

Mr. DIMOND. Of course, I cannot tell that.

Mr. SIROVICH. What is the gentleman's opinion? He represents a great Territory and has a right to express his opinion.

Mr. DIMOND. The packers say that if this bill passes they will be ruined. I know that they will not be ruined.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Delegate from Alaska has again expired.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not commented yet about the coal fields of Alaska. I ask the gentleman be given 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Delegate from Alaska be granted 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, to use a moving-picture term, I feel that I am "hogging the camera." I would not have brass enough myself to ask for any more time, but I do thank the gentleman from New York for making the request. Before I conclude with traps, let me say this: It is pretty hard to describe them unless I use technical terms, but they consist of piles driven into the ground or of nets suspended from framework on the water. When the salmon come to the traps they go in by the thousands, and sometimes by the hundreds of thousands. If these traps could be done away with, the fish could be caught by the local fishermen, and just as cheaply in the long run after they are organized for it, as they can be caught by the traps.

But there is an objection that has been made to me, but not published, I think, by the packers. They say, privately, at least, that if they had to depend upon the fishermen to catch the fish with seines or gill nets, they might be met with strikes in the middle of a season and thereby everyone would be ruined. Of course one can understand that result would be accomplished by a strike in midseason because the salmon run is just a few weeks; and if you stop fishing for a week or two in the middle of the season, the packers and the fishermen also are ruined. But I think there is a complete answer to that: In Bristol Bay we have the greatest red-salmon region in the world—and I may interpolate here to say that Alaska is the greatest salmon country in the world and produces five-eighths of all the salmon consumed in the world. In Bristol Bay we have not had a trap for a good many years, nor has there been a strike there, in or out of the season, for at least 30 years, so I believe that these packers who say they may be confronted with strikes are consumed by fears and there is no real ground for danger on

Mr. CROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. CROWE. Does the gentleman know the tax that these fisheries pay to the Government of Alaska? Do they pay any substantial amount of taxes?

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, to answer the gentleman from Indiana, the fisheries pay about 80 percent of the taxes that come into the treasury of the Territory of Alaska, and they are not overtaxed. The fisheries of Alaska do not pay as much taxes as they would if they were operated in any State of the Union, yet they pay 80 percent of the Territorial taxes, because the Territorial tax, after all, amounts to only about a million dollars a year; and since the fisheries produce from thirty to fifty million dollars a year, it is, of course, entirely proper that they should pay a substantial portion of the tax.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Does the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska have jurisdiction over taxation? May it fix the tax that the fish packer must pay?

Mr. DIMOND. That is quite true. The legislature, theoretically probably, could tax the fish companies out of existence, but the people of Alaska do not have any such idea. They do not want to ruin anybody or confiscate anybody's property, and they purposely have kept the taxes as low as they could be kept within reason and yet supply the Territorial needs. That is another argument supporting my claim that the entire control of the fisheries should be turned over to the people of Alaska. By past experience they have justified the confidence which they ask of Congress in them not to destroy anybody if they have control of the fisheries.

Mr. MOTT. Why is it that under the organic law the Legislature of Alaska can fix the tax to be charged the packers of fish and still they have no control over the regulation of the fisheries? Is that provided in the organic law?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes: it is provided in the organic law that ! the legislature can tax, but it has no control over the

Mr. MOTT. I think Alaska ought to have control over its own fisheries.

Mr. DIMOND. I apologize to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] for not having taken up the coal matter, but I am so engrossed in fisheries that I sometimes forget Alaska has, to my personal knowledge, since I was a prospector for a good many years, a vast body of coal scattered all over the Territory. I was a prospector for a great many years, and during that time I prospected on a river called the "Chityilahina", or, as the white man would say, "Chittystone River." There was a coal bed that I know of personally in the side of that mountain 20 feet thick that ran a distance of 10 miles and then showed up in another valley 10 miles away. We used some of the coal for black-smithing purposes. Up in the Matanuska Valley there are bodies of coal that are practically inexhaustible. It was said this morning that they have to manicure or launder the coal in order to use it. That is not a fact. Some of the coal is washed in order to make it better coal and more usable. Of course, the idea that they cannot use this coal on the Alaska Railroad to operate the engines is certainly not correct, because it is and has been used. Coal all along the railroad is used to operate it.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. Surely.

Mr. MICHENER. What I was referring to was that the coal that was shipped in on the engines could not be used because you could not use that coal with a draft. The disheartening thing about it was that the coal comes out of the side of the hill and then they had to haul it down on the railroad 4 or 5 miles to the river before they could bathe it. The coal and the water are not together. It cost $14 a ton at that time when they got through laundering it.

Mr. DIMOND. In answer to the gentleman, the railroad now pays, as I recall, $3.65 a ton for this coal, and the wages of miners now are something around $8 a day. There is ample coal, washed and unwashed, to supply not only Alaska but, if it were considered economically justifiable, to supply all the people of the United States for the next three or four hundred years. There is plenty of coal in Alaska.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield. Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us the variety of minerals that Alaska possesses?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes. The only minerals we have produced in any quantity are gold and copper. Tin has been found. It is not worked. Nickel has been found. It is not worked. Lead, of course, you cannot give away. There are whole mountains of hematite in some parts of Alaska where I have been, but nobody wants it. Ultimately it will be valuable. It will be particularly valuable to a nation, like Japan, that is without these minerals.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. After listening to the interesting and instructing remarks made by the gentleman from Alaska referring to these natural resources, mineral resources, fishing, whaling, and sealing, what fortifications have we in Alaska to protect us from Japan's coming over to the Aleutian Islands and taking Alaska during a run of the salmon?

Mr. DIMOND. I wish to show to you on this map, which is the great circle of the North Pacific Ocean. First, I will answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] and say that we have about 150 infantrymen armed with rifles down in the southeastern part of Alaska at Fort William H. Seward, and no other defensive works whatsoever. We have 150 infantrymen there. In all this vast body of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands we have not a man or a gun or a cannon or a soldier or a marine or anything else. On this map I point to Tokyo and Yokohama. The short route to the United States is as I indicate on this map. Even if Alaska were a desert, the people of the United States would be absolutely foolish not to fortify and defend it, because this is the short cut on which you will have to meet an attack if it ever comes across the Pacific to the continental United States.

Here are the Hawaiian Islands. What man would be dumb enough to go first to the Hawaiian Islands from Japan and then north to Alaska, when the direct route is so much

Mr. SIROVICH. A hop could be made from Japan to the Aleutian Islands in a day. The islands could be fortified; and airplanes starting at the Aleutian Islands could reach and bombard Washington, Oregon, or California within 6 hours. Is that right?

Mr. DIMOND. Of course; there is no question about it. Mr. SIROVICH. The Aleutian Islands could be used as a submarine base whence ships could go and destroy Panama and the Canal.

Mr. DIMOND. We ought to have a big naval base in the Aleutian Islands, but that cannot be established until December 31, 1936, without violating the provisions of the navallimitations treaty, because under this treaty, in the interest of peace, we gave away our right to fortify the Aleutians until December 31, 1936; but we can establish an air base in the interior of Alaska which would effectively control the water and protect our own Pacific coast. But do not be deceived into thinking an enemy bound for the Aleutian Islands would first go to the Hawaiian Islands, for it is 1,400 miles farther. [Applause.] Look at the map. That is all I ask. May I refer to my remarks which appear in the Congres-SIONAL RECORD of February 20?

Mr. SIROVICH. And there are only 115 soldiers to defend Alaska!

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for this time to call the attention of the House to a resolution I am about to introduce and will immediately put in the basket providing and making available immediately $880,000,000 the President says is absolutely necessary to take care of the emergencyrelief operations until the 1st of July.

The adoption of this resolution will accomplish two purposes; first, it will provide the emergency relief the people of the country are so deeply interested in at this time and which seems necessary should be provided; and, secondly, it will give ample time to both branches of Congress to fully, comprehensively, and knowingly discuss and take up the major part of the $5,000,000,000 relief bill. At the time that bill was before the House the consideration was not satisfactory to the Members on either side. We did not have full and complete opportunity to understand and know what we were doing.

As far as I am concerned personally, and as far as my colleagues on this side of the aisle are concerned, we did not oppose anything that was absolutely necessary to take care of the emergency-relief situation. We did feel, however, and do feel yet that $4,000,000,000 was more money than could be expended judiciously during the next 2 years on public works and that there was serious doubt whether it would accomplish the desired end in the relief of unemployment; and we also did seriously oppose the extraordinary powers granted to the President in the various provisions of that

I specially call the attention of the Members of the majority to this resolution. If they are really and honestly in earnest about meeting the relief situation, they should give this resolution immediate consideration. We are willing that it should be called up by unanimous consent, or even under suspension of the rules next Monday. Further, we will cooperate to that end. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY
SALARIES

Salaries: For the Secretary of the Interior, Under Secretary (which position is hereby established in the Department of the Interior with compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum and with appointment thereto by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate), two Assistant Secretaries, and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $431,590: Provided, That in expending appropriations or portions of appropriations, contained in this act, for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, with the exception of the Assistant Secretaries the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade in any bureau, office, or other appropriation unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act, as amended, and in grades in which only one position is allocated the salary of such position shall not exceed the average of the compensation rates for the grade, except that in unusually meritorious cases of one position in a grade advances may be made to rates higher than the average of the compensation rates of the grade but not more often than once in any fiscal year and then only to the next higher rate: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation was fixed, as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act, (3) to require the reduction in salary of any person who is transferred from one position to another position in the same or different grade in the same or a different bureau, office, or other appropriation unit, (4) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and is specifically authorized by other law, or (5) to reduce the compensati

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language appearing on page 2, lines 3 to 7, beginning with the words "Under Secretary" and including the language embodied in the brackets, on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and, therefore, not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's point of order is well taken. This language does constitute legislation. I may say that the reason it was put in the bill is because it was recommended by the Budget, and it is a matter that comes up to the House regularly; approved by the administration and requested by the Department.

The Department of Agriculture, the Treasury Department, and the State Department each have an Under Secretary; and with the vast number of new activities that have been added to the Interior Department in the last 2 years, this Department is more entitled to an Under Secretary than any one of the other three that now have one. We thought that the justice of the situation and the eminent necessity of the case warranted the granting of the recommendation by the Budget and its approval by this committee, but I acknowledge that it is legislation and is subject to a point of order, and I will not defend it against that charge.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist upon his point of order?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think the matter is of sufficient importance to come up in the regular way as a matter of legislation instead of being taken up in the course of the consideration of an appropriation bill. It involves not only the needs of this Department but a possible precedent for other departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The language clearly is legislative in character. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Wigglesworth: Page 2, line 9, strike out "$431,590" and insert in lieu thereof "$421,590."

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment explains itself. It merely takes out of the bill the $10,000 which otherwise would be required for the salary of an Under Secretary if created at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think that is correct. If the office is not authorized, there is no need to make the appropriation for the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the establishment of a revolving fund for the purpose of making loans to Indian-chartered corporations, in accordance with the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat., p. 986), to be immediately available, $2,500,000, of which amount not to exceed $50,000 shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, for purchase of equipment and supplies, and for other necessary expenses of administering such loans.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Avers: On page 24, line 1, strike out "$2,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,250,000."

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment reduces the appropriation of $2,500,000 for a revolving fund under the Wheeler-Howard bill to $1,500,000. The purpose of this fund is to make loans to Indian-chartered corporations in accordance with the Wheeler-Howard Act. It is a part of a 100-percent experimental program put forth on the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. His whole program is to take the Indians of this country back 50 to 75 years and establish governments of every conceivable form and nature within the fundamental government of this Nation which the Indian has been taught to observe. The Commissioner's program is wheels within wheels and is not based on any theory of progress at all.

The Indian policy heretofore initiated by the Indian Department in this country sought to bring the Indian up to a standard of citizenship and responsibility whereby he would be self-sustaining by his own efforts. The first step in this direction was to educate him in the white schools with white children, so that he would have a complete opportunity to absorb white men's ways.

Under the act of 1932 the boarding schools and the day schools on the Indian reservations of this country were abandoned as far as possible. It is the policy now and has been the policy of the Indian Department since then to put these Indian children into State district schools, all of which have been built, equipped, supported, and maintained by taxation of property and lands owned and taxable within the school district.

Now, here is the trouble: These State schools have taken and enrolled the Indian children of parents owning only their pro rata share of Indian reservation land or Indian allotment lands, none of which are subject to any tax whatever, and in many instances more than 50 percent of the Indian children in these schools come from this nonassessible, nontaxable land, and at the same time the Government is not paying one single solitary penny for the school building, the equipment therein, or the upkeep thereof. One county in my district has 4 school districts affected this way, 2 of which also have high schools. All of the equipment in the high-school laboratories and all the manual-training equipment is furnished by the taxpayers of that district, and the Government does not pay a thing for its wards' use of these laboratories and equipment, and I may say that the Government wards in these schools equal more than 50 percent of the attendance. This condition applies not only to my State and my district but it applies in other States, such as North Dakota, South Dakota, Oregon, Washington, and the other Western States where Indians reside. These schools are overcrowded. The buildings were not built with the idea in mind that they were to take care of the Indian population; that has been handed to them since and by the Indian Bureau. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs a few days ago-I think the 12th of this month-testified before the Subcommittee on Appropriations that the Indian children were getting along fine in these schools; but he refused to go to the Bureau of the Budget and ask for a single solitary penny except to pay a little tuition, the average of which he admitted to be about 40 cents a day, which includes bus transportation and a noonday meal in each instance to be furnished to these Indian children. This tuition, intended only for overhead, does not take care of the cost for which it is paid; it does not take care of the necessary extra teachers, janitors, bus expense, and noon meals, let alone additional buildings, equipment, and the maintenance of the buildings and equipment. And, mind you, the individual taxpayers of the districts are paying these bills.

It was reported to the committee, and I think this came from the Indian Bureau-at least it had the earmarks of having come from the Indian Bureau—that the annual average cost for each child taught in an Indian school was about $290 per annum. The same report showed that in the State schools the average annual cost for Indian children was about $70. The difference is made up by the individual taxpayers in these districts. Bear in mind there is not an acre of Indian land taxed to support these schools. There was not and there is not an assessment or a tax imposed upon the Indian land to build the school or to maintain them. In addition to all this the Indian Bureau is now trying to abandon, if you please, all the boarding schools in the various States. They are trying to abandon the Indian boarding schools and Indian day schools and put all the children on the individual taxpayers of these various States.

Mr. STEFAN. May I ask the gentleman if he has any abandoned schools in his district?

Mr. AYERS. Lots of them. They are all abandoned but

Mr. STEFAN. What has become of them? Mr. AYERS. They are putting the children in white schools.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to the lady from Arizona.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Has the gentleman this particular report in his hand?

Mr. AYERS. I have not.

Mrs. GREENWAY. The interesting part of the report, which comes from the Bureau, is that with 102,440 Indian children between the ages of 6 and 18, only 76,264 are in any known school. Practically one-fourth of the Indian children, after two or three generations of attempts to educate and care for the Indians, are still out of school.

Mr. AYERS. According to that report there are something over 26,000 Indian children of school age not in any school at all. Am I correct?

Mrs. GREENWAY. Yes.

Mr. AYERS. I thank the lady for the information.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman stated he had fewer schools in his district now than heretofore. Has his district an increase in the number of saloons and booze joints like we have in other parts of the country?

Mr. AYERS. I will say to the gentleman that I am now directing attention to the proposed amendment which has to do with the educational status of Indian children.

My idea is to amend this particular paragraph and take from this proposed experimental revolving fund a million dollars and transfer it to educational purposes. The experimental revolving fund, which is to be administered by the bureaucratic theorists, is now fixed at $2,500,000. I think we can well reduce that by a million, and that amount would go a long way toward Indian education and help to reduce some of the impositions the Indian Bureau is now placing on the public schools in the places affected.

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. AYERS. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WERNER. Could not the entire amount be stricken from the bill and no one injured one iota?

Mr. AYERS. I would not cry if all the proposed appropriations having to do with the Wheeler-Howard bill were stricken. The attempted administration of that bill by the Indian Bureau has aborted the bill's purpose.

Mr. STEFAN. Does the gentleman's bill provide for the reopening of the schools that are now empty and deteriorating?

Mr. AYERS. No; I have no bill. My idea is to strike from this appropriation $1,000,000 and give it to the Secretary of the Interior to help build additional school buildings and additions to present public-school buildings so that the Indian children who are now going to these public schools can continue to go there. It is not the policy of the people in the States having Indian children to segregate or put these Indian children out of the public schools, but we have got to do it, because it has now reached the point where the Indians have multiplied and increased to the extent that these districts do not have the building facilities or the educational equipment to take care of them, unless we get help from the Government.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman add something to his bill in order to provide for again using some of these buildings on which we spent thousands of dollars that are now deteriorating?

Mr. AYERS. I cannot add legislation to an appropriation bill. I am only asking for relief, in this appropriation measure, by making this transfer of funds.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. AYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Would it not be advisable to have the Secretary of the Interior authorized to pay a larger amount for the support of the schools which the Indian children are now attending?

Mr. AYERS. No; I do not think that would bring about the desired results. I think we must build additional buildings in connection with these State schools to take care of the increased attendance by reason of transferring the Indian children to these schools. I think this is the best policy. According to what the Indian Bureau has stated, it wants to educate and build up the Indian children to the standard of the white children so they will be self-sustaining. This can be done by permitting them to go to these State schools; the experiment so far has been fine, but we cannot go further unless we get help in constructing additional buildings.

Mr. BOILEAU. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood him to say that many of the schools in his district were being closed.

Mr. AYERS. Yes; the Indian schools are closed and the Indian children are being put into State schools.

Mr. BOILEAU. Why not use those abandoned facilities for the education of these Indian children?

Mr. AYERS. We cannot do that in this bill, and it is not the policy of the Indian Bureau, and I do not believe it is the policy of Congress to do that. The policy of Congress, according to the bill of 1932, is to educate the Indian children in the lower grades, in the ordinary State schools wherever possible. Then when it comes to what we may call vocational training, they should be sent to such Indian schools as those that are located in the district of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Morr] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WERNER], where, in each instance, an attempt is now being made by the Bureau to close those schools.

Mr. BOILEAU. If we made an appropriation here for the Secretary of the Interior to build new schools, they would not be Indian schools?

Mr. AYERS. Absolutely not. This is to aid the State schools where the Indian children are now being educated. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

vield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. How does the gentleman's proposed amendment have anything to do with the matter he is now discussing?

Mr. AYERS. The proposal is that we take $1,000,000 off of this revolving-fund appropriation on page 24 of the bill and put it over on page 39 in the item which provides for the education of Indian children, and authorize the Secretary of the Interior to use in cooperation with State schools. That would not bother the Budget in the least, nor would it disturb the footings of this bill one penny.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to my friend from Oregon. Mr. MOTT. The gentleman understands that the committee has taken a long step in the right direction by recommending in its report that the closing of nonreservation Indian boarding schools be discontinued.

Mr. AYERS. Yes; I appreciate that.

Mr. MOTT. And I congratulate the subcommittee on tak-

Mr. AYERS. And I congratulate them, too; but that does not help these State schools which are now overloaded with Indian pupils.

If you will look at page 39 of the bill, at which place I intend to offer another amendment for the use of this million dollars which I now propose to take from this revolving fund, you will find that in that instance the Oklahoma Indians are taken care of in the State schools of that State and appropriation therefor is made in this bill. Why not take care of the Indians in the other States as well as those in Oklahoma? I am sure that is the purpose of all of us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Wherein does this bill propose to take care of the Indians in Oklahoma better than in other States?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am entirely in sympathy with some of the gentleman's remarks about his amendment, but I desire to place in the RECORD the testimony of Dr. Ryan, which will be found on page 868 of the hearings, a statement regarding the cost for the boarding school and the day school for the Indians. He says:

The rate that we have for boarding schools is a very low rate for boarding-school education. It is between $300 and $350. That is entirely too low to operate a really effective institution, where all of the children board at school.

On the other hand, for from $100 to $125 per pupil, you can operate a remarkably good community school, with all of the facilities that there are on a day basis.

That is the information on which this appropriation is based. The bill carries an appropriation of two and a half million dollars to carry out the terms of the Wheeler-Howard Act, approved June 18, 1934.

Let me read this from the report:

Wheeler-Howard Act: The act of June 18, 1934, generally known as the "Wheeler-Howard Act", was designed to eventually place the Indians, of which there are approximately 327,000, on a selfsupporting basis. This was to be accomplished by the making of

There was authorized by the Budget, $5,000,000, and the committee cut it down to $2,500,000.

Mr. WERNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WERNER. Do you not think that if this appropriation is cut to $1,250,000 it would be sufficient to make the experiments that they wish to make?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Personally, I do not think it is practicable to further cut the appropriation. The Wheeler-Howard Act is the law, and the Budget Bureau has authorized $5,000,000. The committee has cut it to $2,500,000, and we believe that any further emasculation will defeat the purposes of the act.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hesitate to make any statement concerning tinued were continued under the appropriation.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman | any Member of the House or any member of my committee, but I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Montana who offered the amendment is a member of the Indian Affairs Committee. He helped to write the Wheeler-Howard Act, worked for that act, voted for it, and the act passed almost unanimously.

> The gentleman called attention to the fact that he would like to reduce the amount from $2,500,000 to $1,250,000. I should like to restore the sum in the bill to the amount carried in the Budget, which, as the gentleman from Nevada just said, is $5,000,000.

The Indian reorganization act, known as the "Wheeler-Howard Act", authorized the establishment of a $10,000,000 credit fund. This was reduced by the Budget to $5,000,000. The only credit available to individual Indians or organization-group Indians is that provided by the Federal Government. Upon application of the organization it will be necessary to immediately provide financial aid in establishing industries from which Indians would derive income. This may be a tribal livestock organization, a tribal sawmill, or some other development operated by the tribe, or it may mean loans to individuals through the tribal-organization credit and by reason of the reorganization act. Five million dollars is little enough to be made available when we consider the large number of Indian tribes and individuals who will benefit through the use of this fund, but according to the bill we are making only $2,500,000 available. Congress directed the fund to be established at $10,000,000 and it was then felt the amount would not be adequate to meet all the needs.

The gentleman who offered this amendment acknowledged that he would like to strike out all of the appropriation to take care of the Wheeler-Howard Act. I am not defending that act, but I add to what the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. Scrugham] said, the Wheeler-Howard Act is now a law. If it is going to be operative, we have to have funds to make it effective. This reminds me of a few years ago when I was superintendent of schools. My board reelected me and asked me to recommend teachers. I came to one teacher I was uncertain about. I said, "Gentlemen, I am not going to recommend that you reemploy this teacher or that you discharge her. She has not cooperated very well. Perhaps it is partly my fault. You do as you please." They discussed the matter a while, and finally the president of the board said, "Gentlemen, I see no reason why we should hire Mr. Rogers to run this school and then hire teachers to make it impossible for him to do it."

I see no reason why Congress should pass a law, even though some gentlemen do not believe in that law, and then make it impossible to make the law effective by refusing to appropriate funds with which to make it effective. The gentleman said he wants to take $1,250,000 from this item and add it to the school item. I spent 15 years teaching school. I am just as much interested in schools as any man in this Congress; and I call attention to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations increased the amount to take care of schools by $217,000.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Not yet. I call attention to the fact that in this Interior appropriation bill the Committee on Appropriations of the House has cut the amount $3,297,409, and of that amount $3,150,000 is money that was approved by the Bureau of the Budget to put into effect the so-called "Wheeler-Howard Act." I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Montana will not prevail.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Yes. Mr. AYERS. Will the gentleman point out to this House what item in the educational appropriations of this bill provides for the Indian children, who are up into the thousands. attending public schools, other than the tuition of an average of 40 cents a day throughout the country, which provides for one meal?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I call attention to the fact that a number of schools that were not intended to be con-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 1 minute so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Are the Oklahoma Indians exempted from the operations of the Wheeler-Howard bill?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. The Oklahoma Indians were exempted from the major provisions of that act.

Mr. PIERCE. Why?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Yesterday I introduced in the House, and Senator Thomas of Oklahoma introduced in the Senate the day before, a bill known as the "Indian welfare bill" for the Indians of Oklahoma, and we hope to receive the benefits from the reorganization act by passing that hill.

Mr. PIERCE. I voted against the bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. There are provisions in that bill to which I am just as much opposed as the gentleman, and I shall cooperate with him in every way to correct the mistakes made when that bill was enacted, but since it is a law we are going to have to appropriate money to make it effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement concerning the Indian boarding schools.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Washington, February 22, 1935.

Memorandum

Submitted herewith is certain comparative information relative to Indian education:

TABLE I.—Indian education appropriations

	48, 834	52, 451	57, 839
Grand total all schools	87, 471	89, 477	91, 682

In table I it will be noted that a total of $10,185,400 was appropriated in 1932 for Indian education purposes. During that year there was a total of 23,899 Indian children enrolled in boarding schools, and 53,897 children were enrolled in Federal day and public schools.

In 1934 the appropriation for Indian education had been decreased to $9,103,230, or a decrease under 1932 of $1,032,170. The enrollment in boarding schools for that year was reduced to 17,677. The enrollment in Federal day and public schools increased to 65,902.

Attention is called to the fact that while the reduction in boarding-school enrollment for 1934 under 1932 amounted to 6,222, we actually increased our enrollment in day and public schools by 12,005 thereby taking care of not only the boarding-school reduction but actually providing schooling for 5,783 additional children who had not previously been in school, and this was done on a decreased appropriation of $1,082,170. If these 12,005 children had been taken care of on a boarding-school basis, it would have required an increase of $3,901,625 over the actual appropriation of $9,103,230 for 1934 instead of the decrease of $1,082,170 from the 1932 figure. 1932 figure.

Boarding-school reports for 1935 indicate an enrollment of 13,-702 children at the middle of the year. This is a further reduction under 1934 of 3,875 children. Enrollment figures for Federal day and public schools are not as yet available but every effort has been made to provide this type of school facilities for the 3,875 children mentioned above as being eliminated from the boarding schools this year. Continuing the comparisons between 1932 and 1934 to 1935 there is every indication that additional Indian children have been given educational opportunities this year and attention is also called to the fact that this is being done on a further reduction in appropriation in the amount of $1,112,565 under the 1934 appropriation or a total reduction in appropriation from 1932 of $2,194,835. It is clearly evident that the increased schooling facilities for Indian children could not have been provided with the decreased appropriation without the reduction in the costly boarding-school program.

It must be remembered that there are still some 12,000 to 15,000 Indian children for whom school facilities need to be provided.

Indian children for whom school facilities need to be provided. If all of these additional children were to be provided with boarding-school facilities approximately $4,000,000 additional would be needed. If they were to be taken care of in Federal day and public schools $1,500,000 would probably be sufficient.

The per-capita cost for various types of Indian schooling is shown below:

Boarding schools less than 200 enrollment____ 200 to 499 enrollment_____

Public school tuition average of 40 cents a day or $72 a year per

I have not attempted any discussion of the desirability of Federal day- and public-school attendance as opposed to the boarding-school attendance, but have considered it only from the financial aspect. In addition to the day-school and public-s hool facilities being much less expensive than the boarding school, considerable could be added as to the desirability of the former as opposed to the latter; both from the standpoint of the home and community and society in general.

Assistant Director of Education (Administrative).

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Montana will not prevail. I feel that there is some sentiment throughout this country favorable to trying out the purposes of the Wheeler-Howard bill. It passed the House and Senate and it is intended to be a great humane step in the right direction in behalf of the Indians. The law authorizes $19,000,000 for that purpose and the Budget cut it to $5,000,000, and this subcommittee has cut it to $2,500,-000, only leaving one-quarter of what was authorized by law to be expended for this very purpose, I feel it would be entirely wrong for us to prevent the administration from trying to work out what they believe is a great and just step in the right direction for the Indians. I think we should at least give them that opportunity to try out the objects of the law.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman tell me in a few words just what is the object of the Wheeler-Howard bill? What are we trying to get at?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, that is too big a matter to discuss here. The Indian Affairs Committee put in nearly all of the Seventy-third Congress on it and were not satisfied with it then, and I understand that committee is considering repealing it now.

Mr. PIERCE. I think that is about as clear as it can be

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. AYERS].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pipestone, Minn.: For 250 pupils, $82,000; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $15,000; in all, $97,000.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Stefan: On page 36, line 11, after "$97,000" and the semicolon, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "Genoa, Nebr.: For 400 pupils, including not more than $400 for printing and issuing school paper, $122,000; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $17,650; in all. $139,650."

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, this part of the original bill is taken out at this time, and refers to a school located at Genoa, Nebr., in the Third Congressional District of Nebraska, a very fine school with wonderful buildings, costing considerable money, thousands of dollars. It was abandoned a year ago. It accommodated 400 pupils. The gentleman a little while ago made the statement that there are 26,000 Indian children of school age looking for a place to go to school and the white taxpayers have no money to appropriate for that tuition. We have spent thousands of dollars for these schools. They are wonderful buildings. They are abandoned and they are deteriorating. I believe the amendment should be passed and this school reopened for those school children who are roaming the country looking for a place for an education.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman realizes that the committee has been in session for about 3 weeks considering this bill. Did the gentleman ask permission to come before the committee and present his views on this matter at any time?

Mr. STEFAN. I did not, because I was not apprised that this matter was coming up; but I predict that your committee will some time recommend that these wonderful buildings which are deteriorating will be put back to use.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. But the gentleman did not appear before the committee in the interest of the school in question and did not ask that anything be done for his school during all these hearings.

Mr. STEFAN. No. I am a new Member of Congress, and I was not apprised that this question was coming up.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Was that appropriation in the bill last

Mr. STEFAN. It was in the bill last year.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman had a perfect right to assume it would be carried in this appropriation bill. I wish to point out to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Johnson] that this bill has only been available for the last couple of days to Members of the House, and I assume that a Member has a right to believe that appropriations which have been in the bill year after year will be continued in the appropriation bill. So it is not the fault of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. This item was not in the bill last year. I am a new member on the Appropriation Committee and I have no personal information on this item last year. As I understand, however, there was no appropriation made for this school last year and the school in question has been closed for more than a year.

Mr. STEFAN. I think the gentleman is right. The school has been closed for more than a year. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Permit me to say to the gentleman that last year there were five of these schools closed. There was no appropriation for them. This is one of those schools. Apparently there was no opposition at that time to the closing of five schools. They have since been abandoned and the children have been sent to other places. There is no more reason why we should restore this school than that we should restore the other four.

We doubted the wisdom of reducing those schools a year ago, but the tenor of the House was to do so, and they cut these out completely, and they have reduced many more on an average of 50 pupils each. We decided at this time to call a halt on that reduction of these nonreservation boarding schools. We have in this bill restored five or six or more that have been recommended to be abandoned or cut down. We restored one that was recommended to be abandoned. We have not restored the others, because I understand they are not objecting. They think the children have been amply taken care of outside. So that we are allowing several to be abandoned at this time for that reason.

Mr. STEFAN. It is a crime that these wonderful buildings are to be abandoned.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I sympathize with these people. There is one Indian school in my district on which sure Congress will be glad to give it.

actually they have spent a million dollars for public buildings and they contemplate abandoning it. The Bureau may possibly be able to put some of those children in reservation day schools, but I doubt it. That school ought to be maintained.

While I sympathize with the gentleman, that is water gone over the wheel. We cannot go back now and reestablish all those schools that were abandoned a year ago. If we did, we would have to add to this bill hundreds of thousands and possibly millions of dollars. It is utterly impracticable now. All the equipment is removed and it could not be restored without enormous expense. These gentlemen had their day in court. The predecessor of the gentleman from Nebraska did not prevent that abandonment. All the Members of all the Western States have had an opportunity. I sent them all-Democrats and Republicans alike-a letter asking them to come before my committee in reference to any item of the bill in which any of them or their States were interested.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I say to the gentleman that my statement was based upon a misunderstanding on my part when I said that the item was carried in the bill last year?

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I believe the gentleman from Colorado stated that these schools were abandoned last year without opposition on the part of the Members in whose districts the closed schools were located.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not remember that the gentleman from South Dakota appeared before my subcommittee on this matter.

Mr. WERNER. I made very strenuous objection to the closing of the schools, but the objection fell on deaf ears and we were flattened out as though we were flies in a road.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is a shame, nothing short of a crime, to waste public funds by the abandonment of these wonderful buildings and allowing them to deteriorate at a time when children are without school facilities and are looking for places to go to school. It does not seem fair when there are 26,000 Indian children roaming the country looking for schools.

I hope the Members of the House will support this amendment and pass it so we can reopen these schools, which are needed, instead of letting the money invested in these wonderful buildings be wasted. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made repeatedly this afternoon to the effect that there are 26,000 Indian children in the United States without school facilities. That statement is contrary to a statement made recently by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs before the committee. I read the following from page 894 of the hearings:

Mr. Nichols of Oklahoma. Mr. Commissioner, you said that there are 17,000 out of the schools. I would like to ask you if it is not a fact that approximately the whole of that number have close to them public schools which they could attend.

Mr. Collie. No; they do not mostly have any public schools that they could attend.

that they could attend.

The 17,000 is the figure I gave for a year and a half ago. That has been cut to 14,000 now, and most of them are not accessible to any school. They are in the remote areas.

So there will be no misunderstanding about it, the record shows that 14,000, not 26,000, Indian children are out of school. I assume, of course, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs knows what he is talking about. For my part I should like to see none of these children out of school.

This committee gave the Indian Office every cent it requested for educational purposes. If more is needed, I am

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield with pleasure to my colleague from Oklahoma, the distinguished Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact, if the gentleman is not too modest to admit it, that the gentleman from Oklahoma himself played a great part in keeping these boarding schools in the bill this year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will just say this— Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will not say "yes" to that, I will; that is the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for that statement. It is true that I have not always agreed with the Indian Office with reference to its educational policy, as well as other policies. I did insist, as a member of the committee, that Indian boarding schools be kept open. To close them would work a hardship not only on the Indians but also on our public schools of our respective States.

I am very sympathetic with the gentleman from Nebraska in the closing of his schools. When I first came to Congress, an Indian Agency school was closed in my own district. It almost broke my heart. I speak of the Cantonement Agency near Canton in Blaine County, Okla. Since then I have insisted that the Indian Office do something with the buildings. So, as I said, I can sympathize with the gentleman. But, as the chairman stated, the gentleman had the opportunity of coming before the committee and presenting facts and figures. The gentleman did not do so, at least to discuss the closing of his school.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. I was never invited to come before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Then evidently I have been misinformed. It was my understanding that Chairman TAYLOR had invited the gentleman to appear.

Mr. STEFAN. This is my first term in Congress; things are just nicely getting under way. I was never invited to come before this subcommittee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would remind the gentleman that he had a letter from me inviting him to appear before the committee, as did every Member from Nebraska and all of the Western States.

Mr. STEFAN. When was that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That was about a month ago. I invited the Members to come before my committee, advising them that I was going to open hearings, and I wanted to know if there was anything under the sun in the entire Interior Department in which they were interested, that if they were, to come before my committee and present the matter. I sent a copy of that letter to the gentleman from Nebraska, and he will probably find it in his files now.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the fact of the matter is that the gentleman from Nebraska did appear before the subcommittee on another

Mr. STEFAN. I appeared on another subject for the Governor of Nebraska.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And we gave the gentleman a hearing, did we not?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes; and I appreciate that very much.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The item was not carried in the bill last year, so naturally we did not carry it in the bill this year.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. So far as the gentleman from Nebraska is concerned, he could not have appeared before the committee when this school was eliminated because he was not then a Member of Congress. I think the RECORD ought to show that he could not have appeared before the committee when the item was stricken out

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to restore an Indian school that was closed more than a year ago. The amount proposed would probably be entirely inadequate to rehabilitate the institution.

It was represented that 26,000 Indian children did not have schools in which they could be educated. I have here a memorandum from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under date of February 28, 1935, in which the following is stated:

The committee has done everything in its power to amply take care of the education of Indian children. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Werner] appeared before the committee and presented a plea for the restoration of the school at Rapid City. The committee took the position that it was almost like unscrambling eggs to reopen these schools after they had been closed for a year or more. It would involve not only the matter of running expenses but also the restoration of the buildings to a condition where they may be used, the repurchase of equipment, and so forth, which would materially increase the expenditures over the amount proposed in the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Committee not to pass the amendment. Your committee has given great attention in detail to the proposed appropriations, and they find no reason whatever at this time for restoring this particular school to the active list.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Wash-

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is it not true it would cost as much as the original investment in many instances to rehabilitate these schools so that they would be in position to take on boarding students?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. That is the information we have. The schools which were closed were generally those in the worst condition and in the worst state of repair.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks just made on the floor, and to include a statement which I have just received from the Indian Office.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for above-named nonreservation boarding schools, not to exceed $2,618,575: Provided, That 10 percent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditures for similar purposes in the various boarding schools named, but not more than 10 percent shall be added to the amount appropriated for any one of said boarding schools or for any particular item within any boarding school. Any such interchanges shall be reported to Congress in the annual Budget.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Avers: Page 39, line 6, after the word budget", insert a paragraph, as follows:

"For aid to the district schools of the counties in the various "For aid to the district schools of the counties in the various States, where Indian children of parents residing on nontaxable Indian land are attending such district schools, the sum of $1,000,000, asid aid to be confined entirely to the building of additional buildings and to the building of additions to present buildings, and to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him."

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment, which I referred to in my argument awhile ago, I shall state that this amendment is undoubtedly in accord with the present policy of the Indian Bureau. I shall prove this statement by statements of Dr. Ryan, of the Educational Division of the Indian Bureau, and by Commissioner Collier, of the Indian Bureau, made by them before the Appropriations Subcommittee on February 12 of this year. I quote from transcript of proceedings before that subcommittee.

This starts with a part of my statement before that subcommittee.

Mr. AYERS. We have either got to go back to the boarding-school system or the Indian day-school system, or find money to build additions to these public schools. Just one of the two things will have to be done. We have to do something, or otherwise the people who pay the taxes, through the school trustees of the districts, who are members of the taxpaying population of these communities, will make rules excluding the Indian children. That is something that is serious and worthy of a lot of thought. This condition that is serious and worthy of a lot of thought. dition must be corrected if the Indian children are to continue the privilege and benefit of these State schools.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is your reaction to that, Doctor? (Addressing Dr. Ryan of the Indian Bureau.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. I want to ask the gentleman a question about Indian children who attend day schools. May I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in every instance of an Indian boy or girl attending public school there is not a per capita payment made to that school district of 40 cents a day on the average to take care of the Indian child?

Mr. AYERS. That is correct, and that includes a noon meal and bus transportation, if you please.

Mr. NICHOLS. Oh, no; not in every instance. May I ask the last gentleman if that does not amount to more at the end of the year than the per capita payment made to the district in the form of taxes for the attendance of white

Mr. AYERS. It does not.

Mr. Chairman, continuing my quotations, I read as follows:

Dr. RYAN (answering Mr. Taylor's question). I think that is empletely correct. We must assist these communities in the completely correct. We must direction of school buildings.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are you figuring in this on meeting that situation?
Mr. COLLIER. Not in this Budget. There are two ways to meet it. One is through the authorizing acts which passed the Senate last year, which got out of the committee all right in the House, but were blocked on the floor on the Consent Calendar. There will be a renewed effort to pass them this year, probably through grouping them into one bill, making it important enough, perhaps, to get a rule, and then it would pass

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what my amendment reaches. It is grouping all these cases into one bill, so to speak, and asking an appropriation of $1,000,000 to take care of all of them, which is in accord with the policy of the Indian Bureau as expressed by Commissioner Collier and the necessity of which was admitted by Dr. Ryan of the educational section of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, I insist on this amendment because it is right and just and because the Indian Bureau is for it, as I have shown you by the statements of Dr. Ryan and Commissioner Collier, notwithstanding the fact that the Commissioner refuses to ask the Budget for it. Here is a chance to take the Commissioner at his own word and not irritate the Bureau of the Budget nor change the footings of this appropriating bill a single penny and at the same time write the most humane paragraph of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman has made a very interesting speech, but I want to remind the members of the Committee there is not one dime in this bill for construction. Money for construction is being given by the Public Works in every instance. Should this Committee embark now on a construction program, we would run into millions of dollars and find ourselves duplicating or conflicting with the public-works

I also want to remind the Committee more than a dozen individual bills have been introduced to authorize appropriations for the very purpose the gentleman has in mind. Each one of these bills ought to be considered on its own merits. Certainly we are not going blindly to appropriate $1,000,000 without knowing what it is for. The gentleman could have suggested two millions, five millions, or $10,000,000 as easily as $1,000,000. We are not appropriating money here for construction. This is not a construction measure. Personally, I am very sympathetic with any reasonable effort to assist the gentleman. But he must go to the Public Works Administration and get his money for construction.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is it not true that Commissioner Collier made the statement to the gentleman himself in the committee that if they obtained any funds from the Public Works Administration for construction purposes it would be allotted to their schools, and all the Indian schools are on the same basis he refers to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is true.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit, let me make this suggestion. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has already received from Public Works $3,613,000 for school construction and they are going to apply for lots more. This is where the funds will come from, and it is not necessary to provide them in this bill; in fact, we have no construction whatever in this bill for anything, and we ought not to open it up now for something that is going to be taken care of by Public Works.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is the point I have been trying to make. In my opinion $1,000,000 would not begin to take care of the situation some of our friends have in mind.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and I would like to address a question to him. I notice appropriations are being made for Indians in all parts of the country, but I also notice that no appropriation is being made for a very famous and historic tribe of Indians. I am referring to the Tammany Indians on Manhattan Island. Will the gentleman please explain the omission? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am not as familiar with those Indians as the gentleman appears to be.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am afraid it would take many billions to take care of those Indians.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman means under the $4,000,000,000 relief bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It would take several billion dollars. [Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For aid to the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations and the Quapaw Agency in Oklahoma, $398,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Sec-Oklahoma, $398,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of the act of May 25, 1918 (U. S. C., title 25, sec. 297), limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood: Provided further, That of this appropriation not to exceed $2,500 may be expended in the printing and issuance of a paper devoted to Indian education, which paper shall be printed at an Indian school; not to exceed $10,000 may be expended under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, in part payment of truancy officers in any county or two or more contiguous counties where officers in any county or two or more contiguous counties where there are 500 or more Indian children eligible to attend school, and not the exceed $10,000 may be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the payment of salaries of public-school teachers, employed by the State or county, in special Indian day schools in full-blood Indian communities where there are are not adequate white day schools available for their attendance.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Maybe the members of the Committee will be glad to hear I am not offering an amendment, but I am anxious to present the figures that I have been given from different departments as authentic, and I believe they will be of peculiar interest to everybody here. I must say that women are accused of inaccuracies in statistics, but I think it is very much less remarkable than the ability men have to juggle them. [Laughter.]

Some of my best friends have got up here today and said that the department gave them certain figures. They have very little relation to exactly the same figures the same department gave me on the same subject. So they will interest you. I am going to give you a few figures, and they are usually rather dry, but these will not be dry and they will be very short.

For one winter I served as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. We spent ninety-and-odd hours on a bill called the Wheeler-Howard bill. The attitude of the Committee on the Wheeler-Howard bill and its final passage in a very modified form at the eleventh hour is, I think, somewhat responsible for the embarrassment of the Appropriations Committee today, in that they themselves, I think, have been sufficiently confused by all of us. I, for one, did not appear, because I do not feel that the Wheeler-Howard bill is yet an established bill, and for these reasons:

In the year 1850 we had the largest number of recorded Indians in the United States than in any other year—exactly, according to the United States census, 400,764. We were spending at that time in the Indian Bureau to care for 400,764 Indians—our maximum of recorded Indians—$1,665,802. I have no doubt we did not care for them properly.

The next figure of interest is that in 1900, the Bureau of Census shows our lowest number of Indians, 237,196. At that time we spent $10,175,107 to care for them.

Now, here is the interesting part of this picture: Today our Indians, as recorded by the Bureau of Census, have increased since 1900 by approximately 90,000, and today we have 327,958, and we spent on them last year $31,169,296.

We spent $1,665,802 when we had 400,000 Indians, and today we have 327,958, and we are spending $31,169,296.

I really dislike very much taking exception to anybody's figures. I do not. I just present this as given me from the Bureau. I shall not bore you with the complete details. Here are the Indian school children in every State in the Union, broken down as of June 30, 1934, into these headings:

The total number of school children between the ages of 6 and 18, 102,440.

In school, 76,264.

This is very interesting. Of the 76,264 in schools, there are 45,678 in local public schools and the rest are divided between the reservation, day; the reservation, boarding; off the reservation, boarding; the mission, private and State, day; and the mission, private and State, boarding; and sanatoriums.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlewoman from Arizona may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mrs. GREENWAY. I welcome 5 more minutes, because I think the whole of this Congress is faced with one of the most interesting problems, and I hope that this Committee will encourage the initiative of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I hope that this Congress will ask of them a detailed report of what is really happening to the Indian. I think that all of us feel that we owe the Indian something more than we owe ourselves, because of injustice done them.

When you think that our Indians are increasing at the rate of 90,000 in the last 34 years, and hope that they will increase at a greater rate, and when we are launching with misgivings on the program called the "Wheeler-Howard bill", isolating the Indians, putting them back on a land program, and spending today $31,000,000, and still have, according to the records, over one-quarter of the children not receiving the education due them in the United States, it certainly is a grave problem and a challenge to every Member of Congress.

Mr. CULKIN. Can the gentlelady tell me what portion of the 327,000 Indians in the year 1935 are of full blood?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I cannot. Mr. ZIONCHECK. Practically 150,000.

Mr. CULKIN. And the remainder are treated under the governmental policy as Indians?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I am not able to answer accurately.

Mr. AYERS. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I yield.

Mr. AYERS. Can the lady tell us what percentage of the Indian population is self-sustaining?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I understand that almost half of them, and that is very encouraging. I will conclude by saying that as a member of the Indian Committee we are up against a grave situation, and we want to do the best we can.

Mr. AYERS. Can the lady from Arizona tell us, in percentage, the Indian Bureau man power engaged in administration of Indian affairs, as compared with the number of Indians in America?

Mrs. GREENWAY. According to the record given me by the Bureau—I have not checked it back—there are over 7,650 members of the administration—43 Indians to every one of the personnel in the administration.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Can the lady tell us how many of those are Indians themselves?

Mrs. GREENWAY. Of the 7,650 personnel, 2,100 are Indians and 5,550 whites. There is one employee to every 43 Indians. I am not sure whether that includes those Indians.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield? Mrs. GREENWAY. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. What is the real object of the Wheeler-Howard bill? The tribes in my district have rejected it. I want to know what they are trying to get at.

Mrs. GREENWAY. A wiser person than I am told the gentleman it was too big a subject to answer.

Mr. PIERCE. Why in the world did the gentlewoman recommend it? I voted against it.

Mrs. GREENWAY. I think it would be very illuminating and interesting if the Congress could know the reasons why many Members, in good faith, voted for it and now wonder if they were fair to the Indians in so doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentlewoman from Arizona desire more time?

Mrs. GREENWAY. I thank the gentleman; but I think I have probably said too much already. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Natives in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, to provide for support and education of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska; including necessary traveling expenses of pupils to and from industrial boarding schools in Alaska; purchase, repair, and rental of school buildings, including purchase of necessary lands; textbooks and industrial apparatus; pay and necessary traveling expenses of superintendents, teachers, physicians, and other employees; repair, equipment, maintenance, and operation of vessels; and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, including $327,380 for salaries, $17,500 for traveling expenses, $190,120 for equipment, supplies, fuel, and light, $25,000 for repairs of buildings, $63,000 for freight and operation and repair of vessels, $1,000 for rentals, and $2,000 for telephone and telegraph; in all, $626,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That not to exceed 10 percent of the amounts appropriated for the various items in this paragraph shall be available interchangeably for expenditures on the objects included in this paragraph, but not more than 10 percent shall be added to any one item of appropriation except in cases of extraordinary emergency and then only upon the written order of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unani-

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to make some remarks concerning the Indians of Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration carries a number of items making appropriations for the operation of the Federal Government in Alaska. One term in Congress as Delegate from Alaska has convinced me that it is, humanly speaking, beyond my power to persuade either a committee or the House itself to enlarge appropriation items above the sums recommended by the Budget. Nevertheless, it is my duty to call the attention of the House to several items in the present bill which I think should be materially enlarged. These are the items making appropriations for the education and for the medical relief of the Indians of Alaska. In this connection, by the word "Indian" I refer to the native races of Alaska, including the Eskimos.

The amounts carried by this bill for the purposes mentioned-namely, $626,000 for educational work for the Indians of Alaska and $295,000 for medical relief-are entirely insufficient to take care of the service that ought to be performed by the United States Government for the natives of the Territory which I represent in Congress.

After all, the Indians and the Eskimos had the whole country to themselves, and under their laws and customs they owned it in their understanding of that term; they owned it, I venture to say, within the real meaning of the word, before the advent of the white man. The Russians largely disregarded all of the claims of the Indians to property rights in what is now the Territory of Alaska, and with the transfer of the Territory to the United States under the treaty of March 30, 1867, there was no change in this respect. The white people who went to Alaska after it became a part of the United States showed equal disregard for the claims of the Indians; and so, whereas in the ancient times we know that the Indian population of Alaska probably exceeded in number 150,000 people, and those people enjoyed, apart from tribal wars and other disturbances, a comparatively secure economic existence, the white men crowded the Indians, as one may say, out of the picture and absorbed to a greater and greater extent the natural resources of the country, so that the Indians were in many cases, in fact in most cases, reduced to a state of poverty. Considering this condition in connection with the history and tradition of the native races, their lack of making provision for the future, the fact that they are particularly susceptible to the diseases brought in by the white man, such as tuberculosis, measles, and other afflictions not known to them before, it is quite understandable that they have been decimated and demoralized, and this demoralization has been greatly aggravated by the introduction of alcoholic liquors among them.

This is no new and no strange tale. The thing that has happened in Alaska to the Indians has happened all over the United States, so that at the present time I cannot recall a single instance where the Indians, in one form or another, in one fashion or another, have not been deprived of their substantial rights.

We cannot go back now and do absolute justice to them. The world has moved on. It is impossible to restore to them everything to which they are reasonably entitled. This impossibility is a physical one. But we can make amends for some of the injustices that have been done to them. We can teach them the arts and sciences of civilization: we can afford them the facilities for a reasonable and profitable education; and we can furnish them with medical relief.

The appropriations carried in the current bill for education and medical relief in Alaska are entirely insufficient. If the amounts were doubled there would be none too much. Eventually I hope the Congress will be of a temper to render a greater degree of justice to our native peoples.

Many of the Indian communities of Alaska are entirely without educational facilities. While the Office of Indian Affairs is rendering a very commendable service with the funds at hand, those funds are entirely inadequate to do what ought to be done. The educational facilities should be greatly enlarged not only to include therein the rest of the natives of Alaska but also to furnish a better education, a more complete education, for the natives in the schools which have been established. By reason of the financial limitations the educational facilities now furnished may be called totally insufficient, although the teachers are generally well trained and devoted to their duties.

On the health side, the picture is even a darker one. Tuberculosis is wide-spread among the natives. A few years ago, when I was a member of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, in investigating this matter we were told that the percentage of tuberculosis among the native races was 16 times as great as among the white people of Alaska. Hundreds, if not thousands, of native children could be saved from an early death by tuberculosis if they were given the proper care and attention in time. As you all know, after that disease is well fastened on a child, cure is very difficult.

The Office of Indian Affairs has a comprehensive plan for the construction and maintenance of eight hospitals for the natives in the Territory of Alaska, to be in part devoted to the relief of those afflicted with tuberculosis. These hospitals, according to the plan, would be situated in various parts of the Territory so as to afford the best possible service. I am still hopeful that they can be built during the coming year out of public-works funds, even if no other funds are available for such construction.

The Clerk read to line 2 on page 52.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and place the same in the RECORD, including a statement I made before the Subcommittee on Appropriations with reference to the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement made by myself before the Appropriations Committee on February 12, 1935. with reference to the urgent need of Federal aid for the education of Indian children attending State schools. It is

Mr. Avers. Mr. Chairman, the building of additions Mr. Avers. Mr. Chairman, the building of additions to State schools by the Government is what I have in mind—additions to district schools, public schools, sufficient to take care of Indian children attending such schools. For my State (Montana) alone we had some 9 bills at the last session of Congress, and some 9 or 10 from other States. In each instance the Indians predominate in these public schools. In each district the land is mostly owned by Indians and not assessable, and in all instances the Government has not contributed anything—not a single penny to the buildings. The Indian Department simply pays a small tuition, which to some degree takes care of the overhead expense, but which in no way goes to the construction of additional build-tuition, which to some degree takes care of the overhead expense, but which in no way goes to the construction of additional buildings made absolutely necessary by the increased attendance occasioned by the attendance of the Indian children.

We have either got to go back to the boarding-school system or the Indian day-school system, or find money to build additions to these public schools. Just one of the two things will have to be done. We have to do something, or otherwise the people who pay the taxes, through the school trustees of these districts who are members of the taxpaying population of these communities, will make rules excluding the Indian children. That is something that is serious and worthy of a lot of thought. This condition must be corrected if the Indian children are to continue the privilege and benefit of these State schools.

Mr. Taylor. What is your reaction to that. Doctor? (Addressing benefit of these State schools.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is your reaction to that, Doctor? (Addressing Dr. Ryan, of the Indian Bureau.)

Dr. Ryan. I think that is completely correct. We must assist these communities in the direction of school buildings.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are you figuring in this on meeting that situation? Mr. COLLIER. Not in this Budget. There are two ways to meet it. One is through the authorizing acts which passed the Senate last year, which got out of the committee all right in the House but were blocked on the floor on the Consent Calendar. There will be a renewed effort to pass them this year, probably through grouping them into one bill, making it important enough, perhaps, to get a rule, and then it would pass.

Mr. Ayers. I had charge of that proposed legislation. I was chairman of the subcommittee of the Indian Affairs Committee that had charge of these some 18 or 20 bills last session and am familiar with the ax these bills had at that session.

Mr. Collier. The other way would be under this new relief grant, if the terms are broad enough, to simply get the money out of that, and go ahead and do it, and that is, I imagine, the place the money will come from.

Mr. TAYLOR. In other words, get it out of this $4,000,000,000 pot.
Mr. AYERS. That is problematical. That was suggested last year.
We made applications for it and were turned down. We got the ax at both ends—in the House and before Public Works.

Mr. Collier. They were turned down on the ground that this was private land. Under the new act, its terms may prove to be was private land. Onder the new act, its terms may prove to be far more flexible and broad.

Mr. AYERS. The public-works program, Mr. Commissioner, that was talked about, was a loan and a grant on the 70-30 basis, that does not—it cannot—help us. Every one of these districts is now bonded up to the State constitutional limit.

Dr. RYAN. We have been securing funds for schools that are public schools that have not been on the 70-30 basis, wherever public schools that have not been on the 70-30 basis, wherever there was Indian-owned land.

Mr. Taylor. Are you making any attempt toward meeting that situation in Montana?

Dr. Ryan. We have done it in all the cases we could. We have included these public-school situations in every instance where the investigation showed that a large number of Indians were involved and a large amount of untaxed Indian land.

Mr. Taylor. Do these become observable in your neck of the

Mr. Ayers. Not at all. We have not been able to get results, and in every instance in Montana Indian land is included in the district—it is mostly Indian land in many instances. In the instances of this condition in other States—North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, and all other States—North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, and all other States in this condition—the districts include Indian land, and none of them have gotten any building relief; yet the Indian children increase more rapidly than the white children. The Indians are "Bull Moosers"; they just keep multiplying and the children increase, but the building situation remains the same; no help in that respect from the Department.

Mr. Collier. The Budget last year would not agree with us. The Department endorsed the bills and asked the support of the Budget, and the Budget withheld its endorsement, and that was responsible for the withholding of unanimous consent by one of the objectors over on the House floor. I do not know whether we can change the Budget on that or not. I am inclined to look to the relief bill.

relief bill.

Mr. Taylor. Have you any suggestions, Mr. Ayers?

Mr. Ayers. I do not have much hope from that source. This public works will be administered by someone to be appointed by the President under the new bill. We will have to educate him to this need, and by that time another year goes by. If there were direct appropriations provided in this appropriation bill, the matter would be settled. It is certainly legitimate Indian expenditure and ought to be in the Indian Affairs budget and in this bill. My idea is to go at it direct and in the way it ought to be done. It has become a matter of "buck passing" with us Members from the States that have these schools. That is what our constituen's think, and justifiably so—that is what I think.

Mr. Taylor. Can you not get a supplemental estimate sent up here to us?

here to us?

Mr. Ayres. I think the Bureau could do that; yes.

Mr. Ayrrs, I think the Bureau could do that; yes.
Mr. Collier. We cannot. We know that. The Budget would not approve it, anyhow. That was the trouble last year.
Mr. Ayrrs. Well, if we cannot get an estimate from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, then I know we are victims of "buck passing"—

Mr. Collier (interposing). The estimate means they have agreed to it, and they would not agree to the authorizing act and would maintain it as new legislation. This would be the use of Federal money to build public-school buildings on land that the Federal Government does not own, and I am not aware that we have any authority for it in existing law.

Mr. Ayers. Then, we are not going to get the use of public-works funds for this same excuse. If it is just a matter of "buck passing" on this let this committee make an appropriation or go ing" on this, let this committee make an appropriation or go back to the Indian day schools and Indian boarding schools. We have to have relief and the Indian children must be educated, that have to have relief and the Indian children must be educated, that is all there is about it; hence it is necessary to make the appropriation or go back to the old plan.

Mr. Taylor. Have you got it in the Indian boarding schools now?
Mr. Ayers. In Montana, we have one or two small ones; they are just reservation small boarding schools.

Mr. Collie. Montana is practically 100 percent on a day-school basis now, and has been for a number of years.

Mr. Ayers. Yes; the Indians are practically 100 percent in State schools. The local taxpayers are supporting all these without a penny for maintenance of buildings, just a little tuition money. Eurely we are not supposed to go on under these conditions.

Mr. Taylor. They say these buildings are all on private lands.

Mr. Ayers. On school-district lands. It is private so far as the Government is concerned, because it is owned by each school district, but the major portion of the lands in the district is non-assessable Indian land. sable Indian land.

Mr. Lambertson. The maintenance is the big thing.
Dr. Ryan. The tuition runs about 40 cents a day.
Mr. Collier. Where possible we pay the full maintenance cost.
Mr. Avers. There is one reservation where half the land belongs to whites and half to Indians. The Indian land is not assessable. Four affected school districts are on this reservation, and three of them have high schools which are open to the Indian children. They are teaching in basements and renovated coal sheds and places of that kind, because of being overcrowded by Indian chil-

Dr. RYAN. Their treatment of the Indians is A1.

Mr. Taylor. There ought to be some means of remedying that. Mr. Collier. We have done what we have never been allowed to do before. We went to bat on this last year. We openly split with the Budget. We are willing now that these several bills be put together into one bill, and then it will be a big enough bill to make it possible to get a rule, and, in that event, the consent obstacle is removed.

Mr. TAYLOR. How much is involved there?

Mr. AYERS, Well, I do not recall. I have a brief on it which I used in arguing the bill on the floor last session. There were then 9 or 10 such schools in Montana—it has increased now by two or

Mr. COLLIER. If Congress would pass this relief bill in anything like the present form, the technical objections would be wiped out and the schools could be built out of the new relief money.

Mr. Taylor. What do you mean in anything like its present form?

Mr. Collier. The bill as now drawn gives the President a discretion so wide he could undoubtedly allot money.

Mr. Taylor. You mean this $4,000,000,000?

Mr. Collier. Yes. It is far broader than the original bill, the original public-works bill. If it is kept in this form, the money can probably be had out of that, and I think it will not be difficult to get. The buildings could be started promptly and there will be plenty of local influence.

Mr. Taylor. I should think the two Senators and the Representatives could get it out of that $4,000,000,000.

Mr. Collier. There were factors in the act which the appropriating power could not override.

Mr. Taylor. Have we still got those technical features?

Mr. Collier. Not in the relief bill as pending now. Of course, we do not know what they will do to it in the Senate.

Dr. Ryan. We have had relief for situations like this except that the land happened to be actually Indian or Government-owned land. It is a public-school situation and we are for it.

Mr. Taylor. Will you just advise me when that bill comes back from the Senate whether or not there is anything we can do to it to fix it up.

to fix it up.

Mr. Ayers. I appreciate the assistance that men like yourself have given, men who understood the situation.

Mr. Taylor. That bill will come back to conference and the deficiency subcommittee will have charge of it.

Mr. Collier. In the State of Montana the public-school method is universal and satisfactory, except for the matter of congestion in buildings to the whites and to the Indians.

Mr. Ayers. There is no race trouble at all. The Indian children are welcome, but the Government must help on the building situation. We cannot go further.

Mr. Collier. Far from being an untried policy, as Mrs. Greenway says, it is a thing that goes back many years and has been perfectly tried and satisfactory, and the same can be said of Arizona.

Mr. Avers. It has been the policy since the act of 1932 to do away with the boarding schools and eliminate them and send the Indian children to the district schools of the State, which, as I said before, is not supported at all by the Indian patrons.

I just wanted to get this situation before you gentlemen and to impress upon you the seriousness of it. If something is not done, it will put Indian children out of school next year. We just cannot handle it under present conditions.

Mr. Zioncheck. The 40 cents a day; that is merely maintenance alone, is it not?

Mr. Avers. That simply goes for the additional teachers made necessary by the Indian attendance.

Mr. Zioncheck. That is the overhead in operation, but it does not take in anything by way of construction costs or depreciation?

Mr. Collier. It is plant investment; yes.
Mr. ZIONCHECK. But not the original investment?
Mr. Collier. It does not take in the capital investment.
Dr. Ryan. The Senate Indian Committee made a special study and recommended we pay up as far as we could to the actual running costs, and that is what we try to do.
Mr. Collier. Of course, if we had a firm congressional policy, there would be nothing to prevent us paying in tuition an additional sum large enough to carry a share of the bonded indebtedness. The difficulty there is you are going on year after year with expenses, and the bonded indebtedness has to be predicated on the ability to pay across a term of years. It ought to be met by the frank method of a Federal grant.
Mr. Ayers. Mr. Chairman, I thank you and your committee for this opportunity to appear before you.
Mr. Taylor. We are very glad to have had you come in.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 3464. An act to amend certain sections of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901. as amended, relating to descent and distribution.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. Bulow and Mr. White members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the Civil Service department.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the conclusion of business on the Speaker's table I may be permitted to address the House tomorrow morning for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN]?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Reserving the right to object, it might be interesting to know upon what subject.

Mr. HARLAN. On the same subject upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] addressed the House this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

YOUNG PEOPLE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a speech made by the Postmaster General to the Young Democrats at Tampa on a visit to my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am submitting herewith the following address made by Hon. James A. Farley, chairman Democratic National Committee, before the convention of Young Democratic Clubs of Florida, at Tampa, Fla., on Friday, February 15, 1935:

I know it is customary on such occasions as this to tell the young men and women that the Nation is their inheritance and that it will devolve on them, before the passage of many years, to run this Government of ours and to charge themselves with the destiny of the country.

I would like to amend this rather trite declaration. It seems to me that now, and not merely the future, represents the opportunity of youth. It is a time of change—not a change in our system of government or a change in our Constitution—but a departure from old processes, a recasting of method consequent departure from old processes, a recasting of method consequent to new situations and new problems.

There is, of course, a tradition—or perhaps a better term would be a superstition—that gray beards and wrinkles are requirements for positions of dignity and power.

Experience is, of course, a vast asset. But the only way to acquire experience at any game or any business is by getting into it. The idea that rashness is a necessary attribute of anybody less than 60 years old is a proven fallacy.

less than 60 years old is a proven fallacy.

The great parts in not only the national but the international drama have not infrequently been taken by young men. This is shown by our own history. The names of those to whom we refer as the founding fathers of our Government suggest to us the figures of historical old paintings. We get the idea that all of them were stern-faced old gentlemen, who wore stocks instead of collars, bell-crowned hats, and ruffled shirts.

The reason for this is that these pictures were made after the subjects had performed their great accomplishments, whereas the fact is that in the formative period of our country these men were in the full flush and fire of early adult years.

Even the immortal Washington was in his early fortles when it fell to him to command the military forces of the Nation being born.

You may be sure that he was not intrusted with this mighty responsibility without a scanning of his previous accomplishments. He was a major and adjutant general of a military district of Virginia when he was 19. He was only 21 when he was sent by his State to visit the French Army in the Ohio Valley, presumably to see if the war clouds then gathering could not be dissipated. Instead these clouds resulted in the storm of battle, and we find him see at these clotted restricted in the storm of battle, and we find him a lieutenant colonel when he was 22, and an aide to the British general in command when he was 23, and 2 years later he was selected as commander in chief of the colonial forces in the pre-revolutionary struggles between France and Great Britain. He was only 26 when he became a member of the Colonial House of

Take John Adams, who followed Washington into the Pre Take John Adams, who followed Washington into the Presidency. He was 3 years younger than Washington. And we find him a member of the General Court of Massachusetts when he was 33, and 6 years later he was in the Continental Congress, signed the Declaration of Independence, and nominated Washington for the generalship of the American Army.

Go on to the third President of the United States—Thomas Jefferson. He was 26 when they put him in the Colonial House of Burgesses. He was 33 when he drafted the Declaration of Independence, and at 36 he was the Governor of Virginia.

John Quincy Adams who followed Jefferson in the Presidence.

John Quincy Adams, who followed Jefferson in the Presidency, was in politics almost from the time he came of age and a member of the United States Senate about as early as the Constitution permitted. And his successor, James Monroe, entered the Revolutionary Army when he was 18, was a lieutenant colonel when

It is not my purpose to recite to you the roster of our Presidents and what they did as young men, but merely to point out that the first five of our Chief Executives entered public service in what would be popularly called their "immature years", and made such reputations for themselves that the country turned to them, one after another, to sit in the position of highest authority in the young Nation

Not being a historian, I will not attempt to recite to you the criticisms which were heaped on these appointments and elections because of the youth of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, the younger Adams, and James Monroe. But I am willing to wager that there were plenty.

I have no doubt that the ancients of that day stroked their quivering chins and raised their aged eyes to heaven as they contemplated the policy of intrusting mere boys with grave responsi-

Perhaps there were older men with more experience available, but the time called for virility, promptness of decision, and the courage of youth. So they did their parts, and the verdict of their contemporaries was justified and endorsed by the history of succeeding decades.

succeeding decades.

Incidentally, it was not only the young men of that period who did big things. It was before the days, of course, when alert young women sat at their employers' elbows with a flying pencil and an almost equally rapid typewriter, but the wives and daughters of a great number of the Members of the Continental Congress performed the clerical work, intensely important and intensely secret, of their husbands and fathers. And I have a sneaking suspicion that much of the clarity of expression and literary quality of some of the speeches was contributed by these unsung heroines of the most important legislative session ever held.

Then, of course, we had Betsy Ross, of debutante age, who made the first American flag almost before there was an Army to fly the first American hag almost before there was an Almy to hy that flag.

And that young New Englander, Molly Pitcher, who showed General Israel Putnam's hastily enrolled farmers how to serve the guns at the Battle of Monmouth.

And a little later on came Dolly Madison, who, when her husband was President, saved the precious records of the White House as the British were advancing on it and carried them to security

Add to this list the thousands of girls who patched the uniforms of the Continentals and mitigated the winter suffering of the troops with their contributions of knitted socks, mittens, and comforters.

You may notice, if you read the outcries of our Republican op-You may notice, if you read the outcries of our Republican opponents, that no inconsiderable part of their criticism is directed toward the presence in the Government of men and women comparatively young. And, perhaps, you young Democrats may note the parallel of these times with the strenuous period at the birth of the Republic. One would think, if he listened to Republican statesmen, old in years and ancient in ideas, that our great President had gone into the highways and byways to dig out mere infants to aid him and advise him in the conduct of the Government through a period of great stress.

Fortunately, most of these contemporary figures, who are as out of date in their governmental theories as those represented in the oil paintings with their old-fashioned clothes and periwigs, have been retired by the people. Fess, of Ohio; Smoot, of Utah; Watson, of Indiana; Arthur Robinson, of the same State; Moses, of New Hampshire; and many others have been replaced by able, energetic Democrats who are in step with the spirit of the time.

Your organization, and hundreds of thousands of other young men and women not yet affiliated with it, though they are close kin to you in sentiment, played a great part in the retirement of these reactionaries who remained on the political stage so long beyond the period when their usefulness had ceased.

It was the youth of the country, with fresh ideas, with impatience at the old, helpless, drifting order that had dominated this country for a dozen years, who had the courage to face the economic wreck into which the country had been permitted to sag, and who made possible the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and last November gave his administration the most complete endorsement ever received by a President of the United States since the days of those great statesmen whom I cited to you as examples of the success of young men in our history.

Incidentally, your President is himself an example of the opportunity for young men in public service. He was elected to the New York S ponents, that no inconsiderable part of their criticism is directed toward the presence in the Government of men and women comstituted his preparatory school from which he stepped into the Presidency.

That young legislator and a colleague were named on a committee to take up the subject of social legislation, in which they were both ardently interested. These two enlisted as an aid a young women who had already made considerable reputation along these lines. Three people gained their first distinction in these sessions, a quarter of a century ago, and, you may say, they are still conferring along the same lines, for one is President, the other is Senator Robert F. Wagner, and the third is Secretary of Labor Perkins, the first woman ever to sit in a President's Cabinet.

Of course, I cannot promise all of you that you will be Presidents of the United States or even that you will parallel the

It was not by ambition alone that the towering figures in Democratic politics reached their high goals. More important was the zeal to be of service to their country. Men do not gain the higher ranks of our Government simply because of the desire for power or a place in history.

Occasionally, of course, somebody gets there by accident, but in the course in a hundred they achieve these high places have what the record shows as a title to promotion.

Party politics of the most practical kind is a necessity in a nation committed to the two-party system. Organization is the keystone to party success. But all the tricks of the politician, all the expedients of election strategy amount to little unless the candidate for whom they are performed is worthy of the job in which the party strives to place him.

Even party success does not add much to the historical total of accomplishment unless success in election is followed by success in administration. That success can only be achieved by real devotion to the public welfare. The people are as quick to punish as to reward when it comes to public office.

Unsuccessful politicians like to dwell on what they call the fickleness of the voters. It is not the people who are fickle. They put men in office to do the work of government—to do what is best for the country and most in accord with the national desire.

True, we have now and always have had vociferous minorities who have clamored for this or that radical measure. These have been very noisy at times, and the loudness of their clamor has given a false impression as to their number. But beneath the smoke raised by the advocates of economic and political nostroms, advertised to cure our troubles overnight, there is a great and controlling body of citizens whose votes take care of the Nation's destiny. It is a curious thing that while no business man would care to be told how to run his business by one without experience in such a business, in the case of the Government—the biggest business of all and concerning everybody—many a man with a loud voice and a theory feels he is more competent to administer business of all and concerning everybody—many a man with a loud voice and a theory feels he is more competent to administer Nation's affairs than one whose life has been spent in the public service.

Organized minorities have not infrequently created a lot of Organized minorities have not infrequently created a lot of commotion. When they have formed a solid bloc they have been able, by throwing their strength to whichever party was willing to accept their ideas, to control specific areas.

They have unfortunately managed in this way to get a representation in Congress far in excess of their numerical deserts. In the conspicuous instance of prohibition they even achieved a national success, temporary because the fallacy of their experiment brought the country to its senses. But while the eighteenth amendment was in effect it cost the country a lot, not only in revenue but in morale. Perhaps the most unfortunate consequence of their ill-starred victory was the example they set. Ever since the prohibitionists showed what could be done by a solid minority in the direction of political terrorism, many other groups have sought to impose their particular theories by the same method. same method.

same method.

I confess I have a good deal of sympathy for Congressmen and congressional candidates whose districts are plagued by the presence of such groups and who feel that their election involves support of a cause for which they have no sympathy. But there is only one honest course open to men so placed. They may survive for one term or so as candidates of a faction whose ideas of what constitutes public welfare are at variance with their own, but inevitably they are going to bear the brand forever. When the people are suffering under enactments in which such an office-holder joins, he is going to be one of the first victims of popular wrath and resentment. It all comes down to the principle I have already enunciated, that permanent success in public office can only come with adherence to a man's own devotion to public welfare.

welfare.

I think you will agree with me that our Republic is passing through a period of as great stress as it has ever experienced since the days when the young men stood to their guns barefooted, ragged, and hungry with Washington, making the struggle for our national independence. You may be sure that in that time there were not lacking voices of advisers who counseled them to admit failure and go back to foreign allegiance, pointing out that independence was an idealistic dream of immature minds engaged in a reckless experiment.

The mental processes of tories do not vary. They abhor any kind of change and never cease to cite each difficulty of an attempt to make things better as an evidence of the break-down of whatever is being undertaken. The tories of the days of Valley Forge talked and thought along the same lines as the tories of

Their doleful prophecies of disaster failed then, as they are failing now. But let us not forget that the Revolutionary War lasted much longer because of the shooting from the rear and the encouragement of the enemy by those who would not realize that destiny may be delayed but cannot be averted by such guerrilla

The favorite target of those who today would like to see the administration of President Roosevelt other than a success is the career of Henry Clay, who achieved fame in his early twenties and who was elected to the United States Senate when he was 29.

But I do mean to say that the path blazed by these great men is open to any of you who has the ability, integrity, and industry to strive for responsibilities and to prove equal to them as they

These critics of the administration shudder at the thought of increased taxes in the future. I wonder how they would feel if, increased taxes in the future. I wonder how they would feel if, instead of a problematical prospect, they were paying today and had been paying for years such tax rates as Great Britain, for example, has had to impose upon the subjects of King George? Whatever the price of saving our millions of unemployed and their families from famine and cold, that price must be paid. Some military authority estimated in 1919 that another year of war would have brought our national debt to $50,000,000,000. Does anybody suppose that our Nation would have faltered at that staggering debt if the alternative had been the loss of the war and the appalling consequences of a peace imposed on us? In comparison with such amounts, our contemplated expenditures for saving lives, instead of for killing people, seem anything but extravagant. Nor is the problem of reducing the resulting national debt going to be a task beyond the capacity of the Nation to perform. perform.

You will recall that during the days of our prosperity the national debt was steadily diminished and that taxes by which this was accomplished were by no means unendurable. We are a bigger, richer country than we were then.

The credit of the United States is at a high point here and abroad. Our dollar is the strongest of world currencies, as evidenced by the inflow of gold to this country. The billions spent in relief do not have to be valid in dorn where the property in the country.

relief do not have to be paid in a day or a year. And so, when our period of stress is over, you will find the national debt being paid gradually, almost painlessly; and by the time you young Democrats are running the businesses of this country the fears of today will seem in retrospect no more substantial than those that existed a dozen times during the life of our Nation. Those fears now live only in the pages of the history books and other volumes that are consulted by the schoolmen who are concerned with the age-long story of finance.

In any event we have got to go through with what we are doing. Nobody as yet has offered a serious alternative to President Roosevelt's recovery program. There is a lot of grumbling, naturally; some of it by those who can see no virtue in anything a Democratic administration does, some of it by those impatient ones who think that miracles are possible by which a disturbed world can be set aright overnight.

They have no intelligent substitute to offer for the course being followed by the President. But they have a delightful time construing every ripple on the sea of politics, every disagreement between a couple of minor Government officials, every error in the recovery processes to which attention is called when that error is corrected, as evidences of the failure of the program. That's all right, too.

I suppose that such things are unavoidable in a politically minded country, particularly as there are no real issues on which the administration can be challenged. The verdict of last November's election shows how little impression this sort of thing has on the public mind.

This is about as good a time as any to tell you that what has happened and is happening is no surprise, either to the President or the rest of the administration you put in power 2 years ago. Franklin D. Roosevelt had no delusions as to the magnitude of Franklin D. Roosevelt had no delusions as to the magnitude of the task that confronted him when he came to the White House. He knew then and has never lost sight of the difficulties that lay ahead of him. Fortunately, he is a man of infinite patience as well as capacity, courage, and industry. He has met each situation as it arose without panic, without discouragement, and without the slightest lessening of his faith in the ultimate outcome. Under such a leader the war against adversity is bound to result in victory. You placed him where he is. You put the burden of recovery upon his shoulders. And as a closing word I summon you now to give him the same loyalty, the same confidence that you exhibited in 1932 and in 1934, and I know that the call will be heeded by you and that you will celebrate with him a final victory more important to our beloved country than any victory we have won. have won.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk I be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include a radio speech by Frank Belgrano, national commander of the American Legion, made last night.

Mr. KVALE. Reserving the right to object. Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KVALE. I understand the request is to be coupled | with a request by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] to include the two addresses together.

Mr. FISH. I have no objection to that. If the gentleman wants to put in the address he made I have no objection whatever.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is on his feet. I suggest that the two gentlemen collaborate.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I have no objection to the gentleman putting in his own remarks, but I do object to the remarks of any commander of any legion or any other organization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request as it is now made.

PAYMENT OF THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a speech made by Hon. WILLIAM CONNERY and Hon. James E. Van Zandt, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, made at the "Hello America" program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, why did the gentleman not include that with the other two and have the whole program consistent?

Mr. McFARLANE. It is a part of the same program.
Mr. ZIONCHECK. I reserve the right to object. Inasmuch as the question of the veterans' adjusted compensation has come up and one speech has gone in, I am not going to object to the speech of Mr. Van Zandt, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following addresses delivered by Hon. William P. Connery, Jr., of Massachusetts, and James E. Van Zandt, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, at the Hello America program of the Veterans of Foreign Wars February 14.

REMARKS OF HON. WILLIAM CONNERY, CHAIRMAN OF THE LABOR COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Comrade Commander in Chief, Madame President, my comrades of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, it is a pleasure for me to join this Nation-wide gathering of overseas veterans to do honor to our commander in chief, Jimmy Van Zandt. He merits our esteem and affection. His driving dynamic work will live long in the hearts of America's service men.

The veterans of the World War are much concerned, and quite properly so, with the legislation now pending before the Congress, which has for its purpose the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Many do not realize that the service men who offered their lives on foreign soil to protect their country are the only ones who have not been paid. The bonus claimed by the munition, the shipping, and other profiteering groups amounting to thousands of millions of dollars have all been paid. It is sufficient for me to mention merely that after all the war contractors, the railroads, and other groups having claims on the Government following the war had been paid in cash, then the Congress decided to pay the veterans, who really won the war, a dollar a day for service in this country and a dollar and a quarter a day for service in this country and a dollar and a quarter a day for service in this country and a dollar and a quarter a day for the time spent overseas. This compensation to be paid in addition to the pitiful amount given them while they were serving under the colors, but 20 years after the law was passed.

Ever since the enactment of that law, which gave these certificates to the men who served their country during the World War, the Veterans of Foreign Wars have consistently fought to have this debt immediately paid instead of waiting until 1945 as the certificates provide shall be done. At the present time H. R. I, the Patman bill, for the immediate payment of these certificates, is before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. The Veterans of Foreign Wars are supporting this bill, and I believe you should all realize the dee

The Patman bill provides that the Treasury of the United States shall issue money for the payment of these certificates. When I make this statement I immediately expect to hear the cry "unbridled inflation." It will absolutely and positively cause no such condition, because this United States money will be exactly the same kind of money which the Federal Reserve banks in this country are privileged to issue. However, there will be one feature about it which will be quite different than the Federal Reserve money. As you know, the Federal Reserve banks place United States Government bonds with the Treasury and the Treasury in turn prints money for issuance by the Federal Reserve banks. While the Federal Reserve banks have the use of this money printed by the United States Government, they also get their regular annual interest on their bonds. Your national banks are in the same position. The national bank in your community sends to Washington a million dollars worth of bonds and the Government sends that bank $950,000 worth of United States money, printed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the national bank has the use of that money to loan to its customers at 6- or 7-percent interest and at the same time the bank receives interest on the bonds deposited in Washington. Now, my comrades and friends, you can see why the great bankers of this country throw up their hands in horror when they realize that $2,000,000,000 might be paid the veterans of the United States without allowing them, the bankers, to cut in on the payment in any way. With no bonds upon which they can obtain interest, they are greatly worried for fear the money racket they now enjoy may be injured.

Last year the bankers claimed that the payment of the bonus, calling for the issuance of $2,000,000,000 in currency, would mean inflation. Last year the Government had a debt of twenty-five billion. This year, while we now owe thirty-five billion, we are not charged with having gone to inflation, although we owe ten additional billion of the two billion called for in the Patman bill. Apparently we do not go into inflation until we pass the bonus bill. In supporting the Patman bill, I believe the Veterans of Foreign Wars are doing a patriotic duty. They are asking for the payment of a long overdue debt which will reach into every nook and corner of the United States. It will bring happiness to homes that are now dark with despair. It will give a renewed courage to those comrades of yours and mine who have been victims of the greatest economic depression the Nation has ever known. It will kindle again the comradeship we found in the shell holes and trenches of France, and will offer at least a sense of temporary economic security to more than 3,000,000 of the boys who willingly economic security to more than 3,000,000 of the boys who willingly served their Nation in 1917 and 1918.

My comrades of the World War, while we realize the payment of the adjusted-service certificates is a great and major problem now confronting the Congress, we must never forget the obligations of the few remaining veterons of the way reliable. now comforming the Congress, we must hever lorget the conga-tion we have for the few remaining veterans of the war which preserved the Union in 1861 to 1865. The care and love of a great nation must be given in full measure to these men and their dependents as long as a single one of them may remain with us.

We must also remember the swamps and jungles with their ma-

with us.

We must also remember the swamps and jungles with their malaria and fever, where American boys fought to preserve the Nation's honor in 1898 during the War with Spain. This, the greatest volunteer Army ever raised in the United States must likewise have our deep consideration. I sincerely trust that we will never again witness a group of fine patriotic service men such as the Spanish War veterans having to suffer as they were forced to suffer after the passage of the economy law in 1933.

When we discuss the problems of the service men of the United States we must at the same time consider the problem of their dependents, and we should set up in this land a definite program for the care of dependents of all veterans so that they may never find their way to the "almshouses" anywhere in the country. The progress of our Nation is founded upon the loyalty of its citizens. In time of national emergency, the citizens must be imbued with a sense of their national obligations to the extent that they are willing to serve in the armed forces to protect the honor of our country. If we are to maintain this feeling in the United States it is going to be necessary to make sure before another war may come that the gouging of the war profiteers will not be permitted. We must enact legislation which will remove the profit element from war. Let us see our captains of industry and the heads of our great financial systems suffer at least the economic hazard of war the same as a soldier. If it is permissible to send human beings into the bloody theater of conflict it certainly should be equally as desirable to force those who bile up economic hazard of war the same as a soldier. If it is permissible to send human beings into the bloody theater of conflict it certainly should be equally as desirable to force those who pile up gigantic fortunes, because of the soldier's bravery, to endure and make some sacrifice during war time. I believe that we should draft capital and industry as well as man power in the event of a crisis which would call out our armed forces. It has been said that this will require a constitutional amendment. If that is necessary it should be done. Let us place at least as high a valuation on human rights in time of war as we do upon profiteers' rights and if we do I am confident much of the war talk all over the world will cease and international difficulties will be settled by arbitration and this as well as other nations will enjoy a lasting peace.

Congress reacts to the wishes of the American people.

Congress reacts to the wishes of the American people. The bankers and others who are opposed to the passage of the Patman bill, with millions to spend, flood Congress with all sorts of counterfeit arguments against the Patman bill. I ask those of you who favor the passage of the Patman bill to write your Senators and Congressmen asking their support of H. R. 1, the Patman bill

In closing, I want you to know that the history of this Nation clearly shows that it has been our national policy, as set forth by the immortal Lincoln in his second inaugural address, to care properly and adequately for those who served their country in time of national emergency. As long as I live I will feel it my duty, and it will be a pleasure indeed to join with the Veterans of Foreign Wars and other patriotic organizations to perpetuate that sacred principle.

ADDRESS OF COMMANDER IN CHIEF JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATE

Hello America! Greetings and felicitations! On behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, we hope that you are enjoying this unique radio hour as a source of entertainment, information, and inspiration. We are more than happy to have you participate with us in this Nation-wide meeting, this radio reunion of America's A. E. F.

There are two points I wish to cover before we take up the obligation ceremony that will tonight make overseas veterans full-fledged members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. First, on behalf of our organization in every section of the country, I want to thank most sincerely the National Broadcasting Co. for the generous use of its facilities in the presentation of this pro-gram. We also appreciate the cooperation we are enjoying on this occasion from nearly 60 individual stations affiliated with the National Broadcasting Co.

National Broadcasting Co.

For the information of those radio listeners who may not be familiar with the aims and purposes of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, I want to tell you something about the nature of our organization and its objectives.

Our organization has a background of age and experience. We were founded in 1899, by a small group of veterans who had just come home from the Philippines in the War with Spain. These men conceived the idea of forming a veteran fraternity—one that would live for generations to come—an organization in which the overseas veterans of America's wars and campaigns would always find sanctuary. The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States is a distinctive veteran organization because it is made up exclusively of overseas veterans. This is one veteran organization that can never be used as a springboard to political fame or public prominence by the veteran who spent 30 days or less in an Army camp near his home or cruising the waters of Lake Michigan. Our members are not confined to the veterans of any one particular conflict. They represent service in practically every corner of the members are not confined to the veterans of any one particular conflict. They represent service in practically every corner of the globe, from Santa Domingo to Siberia, from France to the Philippines, from China to Chateau Thierry, from Nicaragua to the North Seas, and from Mindinao to the Marne. Our ranks will continue to be open to those who may be called upon to serve under the Stars and Stripes on foreign soil, or in dangerous waters, in the future.

Since 1899 the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has devoted its efforts to three main objectives—the welfare of our disabled comrades, proper care and consideration for the widows and orphans of those veterans who are deceased, and the preservation of those institutions and principles which guarantee the safety and security of America as a world power.

the safety and security of America as a world power.

To date, as an organization, we have been instrumental in the enactment of legislative measures that have definitely contributed to the attainment of these three objectives. In pointing to the legislative benefits that have been created for the disabled veteran, and for the widows and orphans, we seek netther glory nor credit. We point to these achievements merely to demonstrate our usefulness as a veteran fraternity. As veterans, it is only natural that we should understand the problems of the veteran, and do everything that we can to assist him and his dependents. It would be unfair to both the veteran and the American people if those of us veterans who are able-bodied saw fit to leave this problem of veteran welfare in the hands of those who are nonveterans and incapable of giving this responsibility their sympathetic understanding. standing incapable of giving this responsibility their sympathetic understanding.

In looking to the future, a greater membership has made it possible for us to increase our objectives. Today we are concentrating on a seven-point program. Quite logically, and as always, our first objective is the welfare of our disabled comrades. In our study of conditions among those who are suffering from physical handicaps, we have discovered that the truly deserving veteran—the overseas veteran—has been made the unfortunate victim of piecemeal legislation. In trying to keep down expenditures, with hard and fast rules demanding proof and evidence that is no longer available, Congress has overlooked the underlying principle of all veteran welfare legislation. That principle is based on the desire of the American people that adequate care and compensation be provided for the men who saw actual service.

To correct this situation, we are demanding the adoption of a uniform pension, or compensation, principle that will consider the merits of each claim in accordance with the length and type of service rendered by the veteran seeking compensation. There are thousands of disabled veterans in this country today who receive no help from the Federal Government, simply because legal proof of the source of their disabilities is lacking. These men were young and healthy when they went overseas. But they were not the same strong, vigorous men when they returned home. Even though they still had their arms and their legs, they were far from physically sound. Anxious to be home again, thousands of these veterans deliberately ignored or misrepresented their physical condition. They felt confident that the normal routine of civilian life would soon restore their health and vigor.

For the first few years many of these men have been able to carry on. Then suddenly, without warning, time begins to take its toll of battered nervous systems and weakened bodies. Today our World War comrades are dying at an alarming rate.

than 3 veterans are dying each hour out of every 24—a daily average of 80. By a year from tonight more than 30,000 World War veterans will have joined their comrades in the great beyond. These are Government statistics. They can neither be ignored nor denied. They stand as stark evidence that this country is guilty of rude neglect and base ingratitude if we fail to give the disabled veteran the sympathetic consideration he truly deserves.

nor defiled. They stand as stark evidence that this country is guilty of rude neglect and base ingratitude if we fail to give the disabled veteran the sympathetic consideration he truly deserves. The second point in our program demands an adequate pension for World War widows and orphans and for the dependent mothers of the deceased veteran who served his country with hanor. These women and children are the innocent victims of the ruthless machine of war. They are in no way responsible for their unfortunate circumstances. When we force them to accept public charity we are insulting the memory of the Unknown Soldier. We are forgetting the solemn promises we made as a Nation to those who volunteered their lives on the altar of patriotism.

Our third objective happens to be particularly prominent in the news of today. Among veteran fraternities the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States has been the militant pioneer in the demand for immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates. We feel that this demand is more than ever justified today because of existing economic conditions and the situation that confronts more than three and one-half million World War veterans. We know that unless these men receive the balance that is due them on these certificates they will be the victims of gross injustice. At least 85 percent of those veterans who hold these certificates have been forced to borrow 50 percent of the face value. For these loans the Government is charging compound interest. This interest is consuming the balance that is due. Instead of receiving $500 in 1945 when these certificates are supposed to mature, the average veteran will receive approximately $68. Even this paltry sum will be denied to more than 300,000 veterans who are destined to die within the next 10 years.

Let us go back to 1917 and 1918. We had two classes of patriotic citizens—those who marched away in uniforms and those who marched to the banks and bought bonds. Uncle Sam sold a total of $22,000,000,000 worth of Liberty bonds exchange for their patriotism are today branding the veteran as a "Treasury raider." But we hear no voice in protest against the cash bonus that is being paid by Uncle Sam each year to the holders of Liberty bonds. If economic conditions make it necessary to postpone payment, or repudiate our debt to the veteran, then we can also repudiate our debt to those who bought Liberty bonds. But let it be understood that we abhor and stand opposed to the repudiation of any debt that is made in good faith between Uncle Sam and his citizens. This country promised every man who entered the service a decent opportunity to rehabilitate himself upon his return. He was told he could give up his job and his career. We assured him of a hearty welcome and a generous helping hand upon his return.

I have discussed briefly the first three points of the seven-point nis career. We assured him of a hearty welcome and a generous helping hand upon his return.

I have discussed briefly the first three points of the seven-point program of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. I call your attention to the fact that the next four points deal exclusively and unselfishly with the welfare of the Nation as a whole. We favor prosecution and the deportation of Communists and other individuals who advocate the overthrow of our Government by force and violence. As veterans, each of us has made a personal sacrifice toward the preservation of our form of government. We intend to see that those sacrifices were not made in vain. We cling to the conviction that there are no substitutes for the spirit of Americanism and the Constitution of the United States. We demand legislation that will rid this country of those aliens and agitators who merely come to our shores to provoke armed upheaval and the overthrow of the Republic.

If this country must participate in another war, point no. 5 of our program demands the conscription of capital and industry, without profit, upon the same basis as our armed forces. We rightfully believe that in time of war, every citizen—rich or poor—has an equal obligation to his country. If we can call upon the young men of America to sacrifice their lives, and their health, in defense of the United States against its enemies, we certainly have an equal right to call upon wealth and industry to fulfill that same obligation of loyalty.

In previous wars we have always called upon the veteran to bring

obligation of loyalty.

In previous wars we have always called upon the veteran to bring these wars to a close. Today the veteran is taking it upon himself to see that these wars never start. In other words, the overseas veterans of this country are sick and tired of bleeding and dying and suffering in wars that are promoted and instigated primarily for personal profit by individuals in high places, both here and abroad. We regard the present international traffic in arms as one of the main causes of war. We demand that the United States lead the way toward future world peace by immediately assuming full and complete control of the manufacture of arms and munitions within the boundaries of this country. When other nations are forced, by their own people, to adopt similar tactics, we sincerely believe that the threat of war on a huge scale will never again constitute a serious menace to civilization.

The actual experience of facing death in front of a machine gun, or on the high seas, will transform an idealist into a very practical person. Ideals are of little help when a torpedo hits your ship in mid-ocean, or a sniper aims for a bullseye as you bury your face in the mud. That is why the overseas veteran is able to regard this question of world peace from a practical point of view. He has come to the conclusion that the practical people in the past have been promoting wars for a profit and using the idealists to fill up the trenches. Through the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, the overseas veterans of this country call upon the Federal Government to eliminate the danger of future wars by eliminating the would-be profiteers.

In our seventh and final point we are still being practical when we demand an adequate national defense with an Army, Navy, and Marine Corps in accordance with the recommendations of the War Department. Being practical, we refuse to take world peace for granted. We insist that Uncle Sam must be properly armed in order to enforce his desires for world peace. Besides demanding an adequate national defense, we stand opposed to any foreign entanglements or international treaties that will involve the affairs of this country with the problems of Europe and other continents. We believe, with Thomas Jefferson, in the principle of "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

These seven points summarize the activities and the objectives of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. They cover a multitude of accomplishments to date. I regret that time does not permit me to give you a complete picture of the scope of our labors. In more than 3,000 local communities this organization is laboring for the betterment of the country as a whole. At Eaton Rapids, Mich., through our own efforts, we have a child-welfare project that is second to none, and where we are providing the orphans of our disabled comrades with the opportunity to become honest, patriotic, and loyal citizens of the United States. Throughout the land we are developing a program of junior activities that is designed to bring physical, cultural, and moral benefits to the youth of America. We are spreading the doctrines of Americanism and the principles of good citizenship in a sincere effort to combat the serious spread of crime. Within the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States the oath of allegiance that every overseas veteran assumed upon entering the service, that every overseas veteran assumed upon entering the service, continues to inspire him as a solemn obligation to be carried in his heart forever.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 1, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, we swing the incense of praise and thanksgiving before the altar of the Lord. Here we would dedicate the things we love and the manifold spiritual gifts of our God; O breathe upon them like the light that falls upon the hills of earth. The injunction of Thy holy Word is with us:
"Commit Thy way unto the Lord." Any purpose in any worthy ambition, any way we are called to tread, Heavenly Father, fortify us with Thy unerring guidance. By faith may we take Thy assuring promise about the circuit of our lives, keeping ourselves unchilled by the blasts of sin.
Throughout our country, bless all unifying forces which are enriching brotherhood and creating mutual bonds of loving and reverent attachment. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may be privileged to meet this afternoon during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

BATTLE MONUMENTS

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 178, directing the American Battle Monuments Commission or its successor to restore the inscriptions obliterated from the Three Hundred and Sixteenth Infantry Memorial erected by a French organization on property of that organization at Sillon-Fontaine (Cote 378), Territoire de Sivry-sur-Meuse, be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, what is the nature of the resolution?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It is a joint resolution directing the American Battle Monuments Commission to restore certain inscriptions on monuments erected abroad.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Several years ago the Congress authorized at considerable cost that there be prepared an annotation of the act to regulate commerce. That work was performed; six volumes were issued, bound, and every Member of the House received three or four bound sets through the folding room. There has just been issued three additional volumes. No provision has been made for binding. The Members of the House are entitled to one copy from the document room; but, I repeat, no provisions have been made to print and bind additional copies and send them through the folding room so that Members can have a complete set.

I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Lambeth], a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, if he will take this up with the Joint Committee on Printing and see what arrangements can be made for the binding of the three additional volumes and their distribution to the Members through the folding room.

Mr. MICHENER. Are they in the folding room at the present time?

Mr. COCHRAN. No. But they should be printed and bound and sent through the folding room. As I said, there is in the document room a set of the three new volumes for every Member, but they are not bound.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, replying to the gentleman from Missouri, the matter the gentleman calls to the attention of the House is entirely new to me. The gentleman might take it up with the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the special orders for today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Harlan] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] yesterday morning, concerning the Belgian Reciprocity Treaty, was but a repetition of the old argument that has been so often repeated here. "The treaty was produced by star-chamber methods and by this proceeding we had given away the inalienable rights of American farmers and laborers to make their own living by permitting Belgian imports to come into the United States." He was most scrupulous not to include in his remarks any of the concessions that Belgium had made to our exporters.

This has been the constant policy of all speakers arguing against these reciprocity treaties, and it brings to light the real and only issue that there is in the whole question. That is: Shall we continue to conduct our whole national life for the benefit of those manufacturers who produce exclusively for the home market and cut the throat of all producers who gain their livelihood out of manufacturing in the United States and exporting abroad? We may take the records of imports and exports back through the years and we will find that imports of goods plus imports of services, which includes money paid out to foreign investors for interest, carriage charges, and money spent by our tourists abroad, will equal our exports. Prior to the World War, because of extensive tourist travel, large foreign investments in the United States, and the fact that we had little or no merchant marine to carry our goods, allowed us to bask in the pleasure of a very satisfactory, so-called "balance of trade." But it is obvious that there is no real favorable balance of trade. Exports and imports must balance. They always have and they always will. Occasionally there is a slight difference in balance from year to year, or from one country to another, made up by some triangular method of balancing the trade accounts through three or more countries; but in the long run exports equal imports and every import duty that we impose prevents our exporters from just that same amount of business that the import duty shuts out from our home market.

Prior to the depression our production for exports amounted to about 10 percent of our total production. This meant that between two and three million families of the United States were living off manufacture or agriculture intended for export. Prior to the institution of our tariff policy, this ratio was very much increased; but gradually, through the imposition of import duties, we have reduced our export business, and it is hard to see by what right any country can tell one class of people that they may work and tell another that they must not.

Under our tariff policy it has in the past been very unfortunate that exporters had no way of protecting themselves. Take the cotton producers, whom the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Castellowl discussed in a humorous way the other day; they produce very largely for export. They sell on a world market, and they are victimized by our tariff policy in two ways. First, they have to buy on a protected market; and, second, every import duty imposed in the interest of the domestic producer automatically shuts off the possibility of the cotton grower and other exporters to sell on the world market. Countries that buy cotton insist on buying cotton where they can sell their own goods in exchange. The result is that we are gradually losing this business. Russia, India, Africa, and Asia Minor are all producing cotton and increasing their production as we gradually retire from the world market.

The only request our exporters make is to be given a fair opportunity to function. They can and do pay our wage scale. In fact, it is largely due to these industries that we have the high wage scale that we have. These industries ask no favors on the world market. They have been built up by the biggest free-trade market in the world, 48 sovereign States that have no trade barriers between them; and, built upon that foundation, they are ready to battle the world for business. It is because of their invincibility that foreign countries have placed high tariff walls against all of our products.

The ludicrous situation of the United States placing tariff walls against cheap foreign labor and foreign countries placing the same tariff walls against American productive efficiency ought to be apparent to everyone. One example might be interesting. A few years ago our electric industry raised a cry against Japanese light bulbs, claiming that our market was being destroyed by cheap Japanese labor; and now the General Electric Co., as the result of that stimulating competition, has produced a 10-cent incandescent bulb of better quality than the imported one, and has not lowered wages in the process.

These reciprocity treaties now being negotiated are designed to allow our exporters at least a little leeway in the world market and at the same time cause no injury to the domestic market. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the Belgian treaty was negotiated by "star chamber" methods. The records show that the Tariff Commission sent out notices through every recognized publicity channel on September 4 whereby everyone who manufactured any commodity that we export to Belgium, or who produced any commodity that Belgium sends to us, could be heard as to the condition of their respective businesses. Briefs were to be filed on October 22. Oral hearings were set for October 29. I have before me a picture of the bound volumes of those hearings. They consist of 15 large volumes of testimony taken for this treaty with one nation alone—an accomplishment which no committee of this Congress ever attempted to duplicate in times past.

In addition to that, the Department of State had the benefit of all the information accumulated by our commercial and diplomatic agents abroad and by our Department of Commerce at home. Every available instrumentality was at hand to construct a scientific tariff treaty as opposed to the logrolling, vote-getting, wholly unscientific methods that we have used in the past.

The gentleman complains that the authority which the Congress granted to the President to negotiate these treaties is unconstitutional. That has been argued so many times that further words are useless. It just simply is not borne out by the facts. A peculiar incident to this particular treaty is that the Belgium representative, the Honorable Pierre Forthomme, was operating under a Belgian law identical with our own, which did not require parliamentary confirmation for the treaty. Belgium, like many commercial nations, has been operating under such a law for a number of years, while this country, under that alleged able Republican leadership so frequently eulogized on this floor, was inactive and asleep, sitting beyond a tariff wall with no adequate means to protect our trade either at home or abroad. With our antiquated method of tariff protection, we had just as much chance in competition with foreign countries as a Missouri mule would have in a race with an Equipoise.

In discussing the Cuban Reciprocity Treaty we showed how through the years foreign nations had gradually taken this market away from us. The same is true of Belgium. In 1926 we were third in supplying Belgium with imports. In 1933 we dropped to fifth. Our own imports from Belgium in the meantime had dropped exactly 50 percent. To anyone who argues that imports are an evil and that if we would just shut them off and develop our own markets we would be in prosperity at once, it is hard to conceive why this great reduction in imports did not contribute a little to our prosperity.

The simple fact is that this treaty probably gives a greater protection to American producers than did the old treaty of 1875, because we are now able to terminate the treaty within 30 days in the event of unfavorable monetary fluctuations. Under the old law we were helpless. We are now able, if some other country under the most-favored-nation clause takes advantage of the Belgian treaty and floods our market, to cancel the Belgian treaty on that particular commodity. Under the old treaty we were almost defenseless.

Further than that, under this treaty we are protected against an upward revision of import duties by Belgium on a number of commodities, even though Belgium does increase these duties against other countries. The Washington Post for yesterday contained a very good summary of the provision of the treaty:

BELGIAN REDUCTIONS LISTED

Belgium, in exchange, reduced its tariffs by 15 percent on assembled automobiles, 64 to 80 percent on 11 classifications of automobile parts, which, if applied to all automobile parts, would be an average reduction of 50 percent; approximately 50 percent on grapefruit, dried peaches, and fresh pears; 15 to 20 percent on radios and radio parts, on canned pilchards or California sardines, and prupes

The Belgians agreed to bind or freeze the existing quota on apples, leaving the rates unchanged at about 20 percent ad valorem. The quota on American lard, on the free list, was raised to 3,207,000 kilos, while the quota on pork products was raised to 1,044,000 kilos. In each of these cases the new quota represents the annual average imported from the United States in the 1929–33 period. In 1933, however, Belgium bought only about 28,000 kilos of American pork meat.

The quota on women's silk hosiery was raised from 1,400 kilos to 6,000 kilos, and on clothing for women from 3,500 kilos to 6,000 kilos. The quota on collars and cuffs was increased from 350 kilos to 1,000 kilos. In the case of dictating machines and cylinders for them, a 9-percent luxury tax was suppressed.

Pertinent to this discussion, a few additional remarks might be made in answer to some of the arguments that have been brought up as to the Cuban Reciprocity Treaty. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Brewster] prophesied that the lowering of duty on Cuban potatoes would wreck the American market. In the month of September following the adoption of the reciprocity treaty our exports of potatoes to Cuba trebled as compared to those of the same month the year before. In the following month we shipped to Cuba over 284,000 bushels of potatoes, and in the same month we sent them 1,083 tons of lumber. Two of the principal industries of Maine are lumber and potatoes.

The attitude of the people of Maine toward this Cuban Reciprocity Treaty as distinguished from that of one of their illustrious congressional representatives [Mr. Brewster] is set out in an Associated Press dispatch from Houlton, Maine, dated October 17. No one, so far as I know, has ever accused the Associated Press of being Democratic in sentiment or particularly prejudiced in favor of the present administration. The dispatch reads:

HOULTON, MAINE, October 16.—An unprecedented demand from Cuba for Maine potatoes brought encouragement today to the distressed planters in Aroostook County, Maine's vast potato empire.

With their product bringing only 50 cents a barrel, less than the cost of raising, and 15 percent of the crop snowed under by last Friday's storm, the outlook heretofore this season has been gloomy indeed.

But the central potato-inspection office announced today that a Cuban tariff on Canadian potatoes and a prospective duty on American exports to become effective November 1 has resulted in a sudden demand for 80,000 sacks of Maine "spuds."

Sixty-two carloads are now being loaded on board a vessel at Searsport, and buyers now in the county have orders for 100 carloads more

The rush of export business prompted Commissioner of Agriculture Frank P. Washburn to increase the size of the inspection staff here. Washburn said the demand was the outstanding export business for Aroostook County in the past few years, and expressed the hope that it might be retained under the new tariff arrangements.

Last year Cuba bought most of its potatoes in Canada. While the temporary advantage which American producers now enjoy as a result of the tariff on Canadian exports will be reduced after November 1, the duty on shipments from the United States is expected to be less than that on exports from the Dominion.

In 1929 Maine exported commodities to the amount of $9 for every man, woman, and child in the State. By 1933 this had fallen to about $2 per capita, and yet the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Brewster] advocates that we discontinue all efforts of the Government to bring back this condition to

On two or three occasions when reciprocity treaties were being discussed it has been brought to the attention of the House that one of our Ohio colleagues on the Democratic side has endeavored to create a bloc to sabotage the President's program and defeat his efforts to restore agriculture and industry in this country through reciprocity treaties. A letter has been read into the RECORD on two different occasions, purporting to be signed by one of my Ohio Democratic colleagues, calling such a meeting. I may say that I never attended such a meeting, and from the fact that no action was taken, I doubt if any such meeting was held; but if it were, I suppose the Members on the Democratic side are as susceptible to lobbying influence as other human beings.

The fact of the matter is that for anyone desiring to keep himself in Congress there is no inducement to vote for anything but a high-tariff schedule, because the ones interested in tariff protection are pouring in thousands of letters. Those who are injured by tariff protection have no way of knowing when they are going to be injured, or at least did not have until these reciprocity hearings were held, and have been perfectly indifferent to the matter. A manufacturer of cotton goods or shoes, for example, who ships to Switzerland does not know that the tariff on Swiss cheese or watches would preclude him from this market. The watch manufacturers and the cheese manufacturers are storming Congress for a tariff, but there is no one to speak for the exporter. The result is that unless a Congressman happens to be somewhat interested in the general welfare of the country, there is no inducement for him to vote other than in favor of protection. It is this situation that has placed us in our present deplorable situation.

For the benefit of my Ohio colleagues may I say that in 1929 the 1,500,000 Ohio families received an average of $130 per month out of Ohio exports. In 1932 this was reduced to $30 per family, a clear loss of $150,000,000 to Ohio. Yet some insignificant pottery concern or glass manufacturer will ask that all of this loss be sustained by the people generally so that he can expand his already inefficient

Until we succeed in getting rid of a great many of these irritating, unscientific, foolish tariff walls, any talk of disarmament or world peace is the merest twaddle. Tariff wars make military wars inevitable. Furthermore, unless the United States, through lowering of tariff walls, is able to expand its trade, any discontinuance of our uneconomic agricultural policy of limiting the acreage and paying people not to produce crops is utterly impossible. How it is mentally possible for a gentleman on the Republican side to argue against our processing tax and at the same time argue in favor of high tariffs is an unsolved riddle. As long as by the tariff we shut out our agriculture from exporting abroad we will have to supply for it a substitute for the tariff which we give to industry, and that substitute is the processing tax. To argue for the tariff and against the processing tax is the quintessence of hypocrisy.

To those on my own side of the House who may be persuaded to yield to the pressure of the lobbies, I wish to read a letter which I received from one of my Republican constituents yesterday:

DAYTON, OHIO, February 25, 1935.

Hon. Byron B. HARLAN,

Member of Congress, House of Representatives

Washington, D. C. My Dear Byron: It seems very strange to me, indeed, that so many people elected to Congress and the Senate in the great Democratic landslide have gotten the idea that they were "it", when the fact of the matter is that if it had not been for a Democratic landslide which put them into office they would have been snowed under. Of course, now that they are Members of Congress or the Senate, they think they can lead the way for the President, who has really given a lot of thought to the difficulties in which the country has been, and from which he is rapidly drawing us out. drawing us out.

drawing us out.

You fellows in Congress should just sit down and reason out a little bit and think of the many things that the President has done and is trying to do, when for 4 years prior to his taking office we simply sat in the mud and hollered for help and received none.

I am sending a copy of this to Senator —, and this coming as you know from an old-time Republican, I want you to distinctly understand that my views are with the one real man with brains in Washington today who is doing any thinking and that is the President, Franklin D. Roosevelt; and it seems to me that he has enough opposition outside without being lambasted within his own party by so-called "Congressmen" who slid in on a land-slide and did not know what happened to them until they woke up and found themselves elected to Congress.

I am enclosing herewith an article taken from today's issue of

I am enclosing herewith an article taken from today's issue of the Dayton Journal, which as you know is a Republican sheet, and it serves to show the Members of Congress and the Senate just what the people are thinking of them and the President. My idea is that all of you better get behind the President and back him, because there were not enough brains nor original thoughts in Congress or the Senate for 4 years to do anything to help us out of the hole. Very sincerely,

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

THE HAND OF ESAU AND THE VOICE OF JACOB

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this Congress is being flooded with inspired, prepared propaganda in the interest of the Power Trust, and especially the holding companies, in their desperate efforts to defeat pending legislation, particularly the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. It is another case of "the hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob." They are using their victims, the people whom they have plundered through the sale of watered stocks, to fight their battles by inducing them to write to their Congressmen in the interest of these utility companies, or to send Congressmen letters which they have written and sent their stockholders for that purpose.

The way they have plundered these innocent purchasers of watered stock and are now trying to organize their deluded victims, and are organizing them and misleading them into defending their marauders, reminds me of those other racketeers who do not even pretend to be respectable, who murder a man, rob his home, and then seize his widow and orphans and use them as a shield for their escape. It is one of the most inhuman systems of legalized thievery that has ever come to the notice of the American Congress.

I have before me some samples of their letters, wherein they write their stockholders to either write or wire immediately to their Representative in Congress in their behalf. With this letter is enclosed an appeal issued by representatives of some of these large holding companies, with the names of the officials, usually the president of the company or chairman of the board, as the ones who are sponsoring the appeal.

I am going to call your attention to some facts connected with these names. In the first place, I want to remind you of the fact that the companies represented here are among the ones whose stocks have gone down to almost nothing. I am going to take them as I come to them, and if you will bear with me, I will read the entire list into the RECORD.

I read to you the other day where President Roosevelt denounced their practices as "theft within the law." In my opinion, as I said then, there has not been such a saturnalia of legalized thievery practiced upon an unsuspecting public since organized governments began.

We will take the first one-the American Gas & Electric Co. In 1928 the president of that company, whose name is attached to this appeal, Mr. George N. Tidd, drew a salary of $45,000 from the holding company and $92,740 from the small subsidiary companies he was supposed to represent, making a total of $137,740. In 1929 his salary with the holding company had been raised to $65,000 and to $109,705 from the subsidiaries, making a total of $174,705. In 1930 his salary with the holding company had been raised to $75,000 and was $103,170 from the subsidiaries, making a total of $183,170-at a time when we were in the very pit of the depression and when bread lines were stretching down the streets of every city in America. His salary was $75,000 in 1931, $75,000 in 1932, and $75,000 in 1933, which is the last year for which these salaries are given.

Let us see what his stocks went to. In 1929, which was a prosperous year-the peak of Hoover prosperity on the stock exchange—the preferred stock in this company was selling at 111. That year he was drawing $45,000 salary from this company and $92,740 from the subsidiary companies; but by 1930 that stock had dropped to 104, and his salary with the company had gone from $45,000 to $75,000; and from the subsidiaries it had climbed to $108,170. As his salary increased the stock in the company declined until the company's preferred stock sank to 50 and below.

In 1928 the common stock in this holding company was selling for 195, and for 254% in 1929. In 1932 it had dropped to 141/2, and yet his salary had gone from $45,000 in 1928 to $75,000 in 1932, and was $75,000 in 1933 when the common stock in that concern was just about as worthless as it is today, when it is quoted on the New York Curb Exchange at 17%.

Now, let us take Mr. Hobart H. Porter, president of the American Waterworks & Electric Co., whose name is also on this propaganda they are sending out appealing to you to save the widows and orphans on whom they unloaded these watered stocks when they knew, or ought to have known, that they were practically worthless.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RANKIN. For a question; yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I ask this as a question. The gentleman said this stock was sold by these people. What has that to do with the widow who bought the stock and who is now suffering? We cannot punish those men for that now.

Mr. RANKIN. It was practically worthless when it was sold, and everybody on the inside knew it.

Mr. MICHENER. Are we going to be a party to that robbery or are we going to try to get at the root of the evil and take care of the men who brought about the robbery?

Mr. RANKIN. No; we are not going to be a party to it. They were robbed when they bought it.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is talking about water that has gone over the wheel.

Mr. RANKIN. No; it has not gone over the wheel. I am talking about water in these stocks.

Let us see what Mr. Porter's salary was during these years. In 1928 it was $50,000; in 1929, $75,000; in 1930, $75,000; in 1931, $75,000; in 1932, $71,250; and in 1933, $67,500; although we were in the midst of the greatest depression of all times. Let us see what the stock in this company was worth at that time, and what they are worth now. In 1929 the first preferred was selling at 104, but in 1932, when his salary had gone up to $75,000, it had dropped to 26, and the common stock which was selling at 199 in 1929 had dropped to 231/2, and yet his salary was raised in the meantime from $50,000 in 1928 to $75,000 in 1931. It was $71,250 in 1932, although the common stock was down to 11.

Let us take next Mr. Philip G. Gossler, of the Columbia Gas & Electric Co. His name is also on this propaganda. We find he was drawing a salary of $99,999 in 1928, and $150,867 from the small companies they were bleeding, making a total of $150,867. But, as the depression increased, things changed, and in 1929 his salary was still $99,999, and the other rake-offs from these small companies they were supposed to represent as their subsidiaries amounted to $151,355, making a total of $251,335. In 1930 his salary with the company was $99,999 and from the subsidiaries $133,-383, making a total of $233,383. In 1931 they were $99,999 and $79,739, making a total of $179,738. He drew a salary of $94,939 in 1932 and one of $90,000 in 1933. While the 6-percent preferred stock dropped from 109 in 1929 to 50 in 1933, and the common stock fell from 140 in 1929 to 9 in 1933. It is now down to 41/2, and was before the Wheeler-Rayburn bill was ever introduced.

T. W. Martin was formerly president of the Commonwealth & Southern. It was organized in 1929 and he became its first president. He started in with a salary of $43,790 in 1929. The panic came on and they raised his salary to $75,000 in 1930. The panic continued and the next year, 1931, it was $72,500. The panic grew worse and in 1932 they paid him a salary of $130,000-more than twice the salary of the President of the United States after he returned his cut.

Now let us see what their stock was worth. In 1930 the 6-percent preferred was 10434; in 1932, the year the president's salary reached $130,000, they had dropped to 27%, and the common stock had dropped from 32 in 1929 to 1% in 1932: and the values of the stocks of their subsidiaries had virtually disappeared—long before the Wheeler-Rayburn bill was ever introduced. But they tell you they have been paying dividends. If so, they have been paying them out of the capital stock, and they were bound to cease.

Now, coming to the Electric Bond & Share Co., Mr. C. E. Grosbeck, president of that concern, received a salary in 1928 of $84,000 and from the subsidiaries $101,420, or a total of

The panic broke the next year, and in 1929 he received a salary of $106,000 from the company and $121,780 from the subsidiaries. The panic continued and grew worse, and in 1931 he was drawing a salary of $120,000. In 1932 he drew a salary of $102,000, and in 1933 his salary was $90,000.

Now, let us see about the stock in this Electric Bond & Share Co.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RANKIN. For a brief question.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman know what is the salary paid to the lobbyist now in Washington trying to defeat the bill-lobbyist from Cleveland and other cities, drawing $125,000?

Mr. RANKIN. I am not surprised.

In 1929, the 6-percent preferred stock was 109, and in 1932 it had dropped to 19. The common stock was 187 in 1929, and in 1932, when the president's salary was $102,000, it had dropped to 5%.

The values of all the stocks in all of these holding companies fell consistently from 1929 to the present day, although the officials raised their high salaries higher as conditions grew worse. The dividends paid during these years were evidently paid out of the capital of the company, and the same thing might be said of these salaries.

This money paid out by the Commonwealth & Southern was wrung from the overburdened people of Mississippi, Alabama, and other States through unreasonable light and power rates, or taken from the unsuspecting purchasers of their watered stocks.

People now complain about losing their money they have invested in these stocks. The fact is, they lost it when they invested it. Those stocks were practically worthless when they bought them.

Here we have Mr. John J. O'Brien, president of the Standard Gas & Electric Co. In 1928 he received a salary of $50,000; in 1931 he received $75,000; and the salary in 1933 was $63,750, although their preferred stock fell from 115 in 1928 down to 16 in 1933 and the common stock dropped from 243 in 1929 to 51/8 in 1933.

Here is another man connected with the Electric Bond & Share Co., Mr. Harvey C. Couch, president of the Arkansas Light & Power Co. and president of the Louisiana Light & Power Co. and president of the Mississippi Light & Power Co. In 1928 he was drawing a salary of $50,000; in 1929 it was $59,000; in 1930 the salary was $64,500; in 1931 it was $63,330; during which time he also drew a salary of $10,000 a year as a member of the R. F. C. In 1932 his salary with this company was $67,603 and in 1933, $66,500, yet during that time the stock in his company went down and down and down to where it was practically worthless. The 6-percent preferred stock dropped from 109 in 1929 to 25 in 1933, and the common stock from 189 in 1929 to 5% in 1932. It is now down to 11/8.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Are not these gentlemen who have received these high salaries the ones who are so solicitous about the widow and the orphan?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes; they are continually talking about the widows and the orphans—the innocent purchaser—when, as a matter of fact, they knew these stocks were practically worthless when they sold them to these innocent purchasers. These holding companies owned practically no tangible assets at the time these stocks were issued, and they own practically none now.

Nine out of ten of them would never pay another dollar of dividends, even if we passed no legislation at all, unless they paid them out of their capital, as some of them have evidently been doing; and as I said, that would soon exhaust the capital and leave the stock absolutely worthless.

The stocks in the operating companies would be worth more if these holding companies were abolished entirely.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman has probably recognized that the letters he is receiving in many cases are almost exact in wording; in my case even to the misspelling of my name on one consignment.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. WEARIN. Has the gentleman made any check-up of the names assigned to these letters? I have, and I have found through reports of various postmasters in the District that many are fictitious.

Mr. RANKIN. That is true.

But these stockholders are asking what recourse they have for getting back the money which they have invested. They are not without their remedy. I discussed this proposition recently with one of the ablest lawyers connected with this Government, and he agreed with the statement that I made in a recent speech here in the House, to the effect that these people who own preferred stocks have a right to go into court, bring suit, and recover against the company issuing them, in case the dividends provided in those preferred stocks are not paid.

The holders of the common stock, as well as the preferred stockholders, have a right to go into court and demand an accounting of these officials who have paid themselves these unreasonable salaries out of the company's assets-not only the excessive salaries, but for money otherwise wrongfully spent. The officials of these companies are aware of these rights on the part of the stockholders and are therefore throwing out this propaganda as a smokescreen in order to try to delude their unfortunate victims into wreaking their vengeance on the Congress that is trying to protect them, instead of bringing to justice the ones who have exploited them.

The preferred stockholders in one of these companies brought suit in a court of equity in my own State, and obtained a judgment for the amount invested-just as will be done in every State where these suits are brought.

The distinguished lawyer to whom I referred gave it also as his candid opinion that the people who have been paying the unreasonable light and power rates which these holding companies have compelled their subsidiaries to impose, or which their subsidiaries have imposed without being compelled, could go into a court of equity, bring suit, and demand an accounting and force a redistribution of the overcharges.

I thank the House for this opportunity of speaking for a short time on this vital subject, to show you just what practices are being resorted to in order to mislead Members of Congress into opposing one of the most salutary measures that has been offered here since I have been a Member of Congress. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the conclusion of any business on the Speaker's desk, I may be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a radio speech made by the national commander of the American Legion. Objection was made last night that the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the speech of the national commander should both be incorporated. In view of the fact that it will take some time to get that address of the national commander, I am asking this request now. Those who made the objection last night have withdrawn their objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object, I received permission to insert that address, and I expect to insert it along with my own. It is more in the nature of a debate. The address has been promised to me either today or early tomorrow morning, and I expect to insert it in the RECORD when it is received. I hope, under the circumstances, the gentleman will not insist upon his unanimous-consent request. I cannot understand why the gentleman wants the same speech inserted in the Congressional Record more than one time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman state whether it is the intention to wait and put in his own remarks until the time these remarks are received?

Mr. PATMAN. I expect to do that; yes. I am holding up my own speech until the Belgrano speech is received.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his request at this time.

Mr. FISH. I will put it in with the gentleman's address. Let my request go through. I will put it in with the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. PATMAN. I object under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Departand for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6223, the Interior Department appropriation bill, with Mr. MEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: For the Commissioner of Reclamation and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $96,500; for office expenses in the District of Columbia, $15,000; in all, $111,500.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, when the able Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] addressed the Committee yesterday he stated that, judging from the expressions and attitude of some gentlemen, they felt that Alaska should be given back to Russia. I interjected to say to the gentleman that he did not need to feel lonely; that, judging from the expression and attitude of some gentlemen on this floor, they felt that the entire western United States was a national liability and that it ought to be given back to Mexico and France, whence it came.

It is related that Daniel Webster once on the floor of the United States Senate, referring to some proposed activity on the part of the Federal Government in the West as it then existed, referred to that great area between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean as not only an uninhabited wilderness of mountains and deserts but, further, that it probably never would be inhabited, and the United States would probably never have any occasion to undertake to develop that country. Sometimes it sounds to me, especially when we have the Interior Department appropriation bill before us, that there are some gentlemen who feel that if Daniel Webster was not right he ought to have been right, and that this great section of the country is only a continuing liability to the Federal Government. This is especially true when anything is involved including reclamation or

I wish to say to you gentlemen, honestly, that I shrink from the appearance of the Interior Department bill on the floor of this House. If it carries an appropriation for publicdomain roads, I expect to hear some gentlemen jump up here with a motion to cut it in half and deliver himself of a brainstorm against wasting Federal funds on the roads and highways of the West. I expect to see him doing the same thing with regard to reclamation. I see a gentleman sitting here who the other day referred to what he called the "fatal policy of reclamation." I believe there was some gentleman on the floor yesterday who even objected to the competition which the sugar beets of the West gave to sugar beets in his State, and for some reason like that, some pusillanimous reason like that, he felt that Federal aid should be withdrawn from that section of the country. I say to you, gentlemen, that that is certainly spelling sectionalism with a small "s."

It has been pointed out that the agricultural output of the reclamation projects of this country does not amount to more than 1 percent of the total agricultural output of the entire country. It has also been pointed out that those are in the main noncompetitive crops. We do not compete with the South because we do not raise any cotton and we do not raise any tobacco. We compete very little with the great Wheat and Corn Belts because corn and wheat are negligible products of the irrigated West. They are what we call mostly "special crops" particularly adapted to the soil and climate of that section of the country-products which cannot be produced in like quality elsewhere in the country-and which compete little elsewhere.

Speaking of western crops coming into competition with other crops-and I do not admit that such an argument is valid for a moment, even if true, but take the matter of pinto beans, which is a considerable agricultural crop in just two States-New Mexico and Colorado. Those beans ment of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, Idaho, with the New York or California products. They are a peculiar variety and they build up their own market, and they can actually exist alongside of these other crops in other sections of the country without affecting the demand for them or the market price of them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to leave that all out of the picture and direct your attention for the next 2 or 3 minutes to a common United States map gotten out by the Department of the Interior. I want to direct your attention to the right side of this map, the section of the map which looks like Joseph's coat of many colors. This map condition very properly causes our section of the country to be called the "public-land States", and making the West a Federal dependency without corresponding benefits growing out of the relationship. All those green patches on that map represent Federal forest reserves; the yellow ones represent Indian reservations; the purple ones represent national parks. Others of these colors represent other Federal reservations on the public lands of the West. All of our forests and these altered colored sections have been taken out of circulation. The man who runs our forests is not the Governor of Colorado out yonder in the State capitol at Denver. He is a gentleman by the name of Wallace down here in the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Ickes runs our national parks; Mr. Somebody else runs our Indian reservations; and so forth, and so forth. So, through the medium of these reservations all these natural resources of the West have been taken away from us and taken out of circulation. But the colored portions of the map do not tell the whole story.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that only a part of the public domain is represented by the colored patches on the map. None of the appropriated public domain is shown on that map.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is just what I was going to say. The colored patches on this map represent far less than half of it, because a goodly part of all the rest is public domain; and all of the mineral resources on the public domain were withdrawn and reserved by the Federal Government 30 years ago. All this uncolored portion of the map in here is under that handicap. If you go out and take a homestead, all you get is a grass-roots right; the minerals, the oil, the gold, the silver, the coal, any mineral value whatever has been withdrawn and reserved by the Federal Government; and all the purchaser gets is a surface right. In short, the Federal Government owns about one-third of the area of the publicland States and all their mineral and timber resources.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. STUBBS. For fear the Members of the House may get the idea that we have only Indian reservations and such things out in the far West, I would like to make the observation that one of the counties in my district in California is the fourth largest agricultural county in the United States, and its adjoining county raises more cotton per acre than any county in the United States, or in the world.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let us contrast that condition of our natural resources with the condition that exists in the rest of the country. Here is the great empire State of Texas. Texas owns every foot of soil in that State, and everything under the soil and from the center of the earth to the top limits of the sky. The same applies to all the Eastern and Southern States. If you have a piece of land in Illinois or Pennsylvania or Virginia, and there is an oil deposit under it, or a gold deposit or coal or any other valuable deposit, it is yours. In our country it does not belong to the owner of the surface of the land; it belongs to the Government. In the Eastern and Southern States when you buy a piece of land it is yours, upward and downward; nobody can come in compete very little with the Michigan product, with the on it and prospect for oil or other mineral. If you own a piece of land in the West, anybody can come in and prospect on it for oil or other mineral; and if he finds it, it is his, not yours. So our situation is entirely different. The things that would have made the West independent, the things that would have freed the West from the necessity of reliance on the Federal Government have all been withdrawn and taken away from it by the Federal Government and held by it for the benefit of all the country, and it is a great benefit. I think the statement was made yesterday by the gentleman from Wyoming that the Federal Government had collected $55,000,000 in royalties from the oil wells of the State of Wyoming.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we can make this proposition, and I want the Members to keep this in mind when you hear talk about raiding the Treasury for reclamation and irrigation projects.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to make this proposition, and I believe I can speak for the entire West when I say that if the Federal Government will return to the Western States the resources on top of and under their soils, turn it over to us in fee simple, we will withdraw all claims for aid against the Federal Government and finance ourselves.

I do not represent a reclamation project; there is not one in my district. I represent two of the greatest farming valleys in the State of Colorado—the Arkansas and San Luis Valleys—and the Federal Government never put a dollar into the construction of an irrigation project there. All irrigation projects there have been built by private enterprise, and if the Federal Government has refinanced any of them by lending any money it has been secured by first mortgages on those enterprises, including lands and water rights. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, as a Member from the State of Pennsylvania I am not at all concerned about these pusillanimous sectionalisms; and if I had the power to turn these lands over to the gentlemen's States in the West I would give them the land from the mountain tops to the center of the earth.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I should like to have the gentleman go down to the departments and put that proposition up to them for us and see what kind of an answer he would get. The answer they would give him would show what value they think the West is to the rest of the country.

Mr. RICH. I went to the Public Lands Committee and asked the members of the committee if they would not try to have these public lands returned to the States wherein they were located; and last year 176,000 acres of the public land were opened to grazing.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; but that is just to the grass roots; they did not give us anything that was under the 176,000 acres; and what is under the surface may be worth 1,000 times more than what is on the surface.

Mr. RICH. If the Federal Government would turn the public lands over to each State that are within their boundaries, I feel it would be a forward step for our country.

I want to speak in reference to the grazing lands that we turned over to the Department of the Interior last year, at which time we suggested that the grazing lands should be segregated under the Taylor bill, which is an elegant bill for the western people outside of the fact that it gives dual control to the Department of the Interior and Department of Agriculture to the grazing of this country. At the time we had the hearings in reference to this matter Secretary Ickes made the statement it would not set up a new bureau and would not cost additional funds; but in this bill we are considering today the Federal Government is asked to give $250,000, and Secretary Ickes at the present time is setting up in his Department a division of grazing control. This is the information we just got in the Committee on the Public Lands not over an hour ago. We are to have a division of grazing control in the Department of the Interior. We are going to have a division of grazing under the Forest Service of the Agricultural Department. It is only another bureau, and Secretary Ickes last year gave our committee assurances that there would be no new department set up.

I should like to inquire from the Members of Congress what kind of a promise that is. Can we believe the Secretary hereafter? At the present time they are figuring on setting up 50 districts in the United States and to employ 140 people besides the individuals who will be connected with the Department here in Washington.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make an observation to the Members of Congress that right now under the Department of the Interior we are going to establish this new bureau of grazing control in the Department of the Interior. I call attention also to the statements that were made by Secretary Ickes that he was willing that this be under the control of one department. Secretary Wallace came to the Public Lands Committee last year and said that he and the Secretary of the Interior were going to figure out, with the aid and assistance of the President of the United States, a scheme whereby this work could be segregated. They are not doing what they promised to do, and I say that we are only creating a new bureau which is going to cost the taxpayers of this country annually large sums of money, which will require increased taxation in order to carry on this work. When the Committee on the Public Lands tries to get information in reference to the conduct of certain legislation that they would like to know about, they must write to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Secretary of the Interior, because the committee cannot get an answer from any one department because their interests conflict.

When it comes to voting on this bill, I hope the Members will ask that the bill be reconsidered and that we may turn back to page 4 of the bill, under division of grazing control, and eliminate the $250,000 which Mr. Ickes asked for, because it is not right, and it is not in accordance with the promises that he made to the Committee on the Public Lands last year. It is not right to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why cannot the General Land Office handle all this?

Mr. RICH. I suppose it could. I am not particularly interested in what department handles the matter. I am only interested in trying to eliminate dual control and eliminate expenditures, if it is possible to do so. If it should be under the control of the Department of Agriculture, all right. If it should be under the Department of the Interior, that is satisfactory. But it should be under one department that will have absolute control.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, may I say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich] certainly displays a lack of knowledge in reference to the West and western conditions. There is no attempt on the part of anybody to inflict further taxes by reason of the Taylor bill or by reason of legislation covering grazing on the public domain. However, it must be put into operation. How can it be put into operation without an appropriation? The men who are about to use the millions of acres of public domain are going to pay for it eventually, but they must have some chance to get the organization together. This appropriation is only temporary.

As far as the statements made about putting these bureaus together are concerned, that is much wind about nothing. What does it matter? They are altogether two different propositions, involving the forests, on one hand, and the public domain, most of which can never be homesteaded, on the other hand. This public domain is of most value for I live pleasantly and profitably on a few of these projects winter grazing; therefore, as I stated, they are altogether different propositions.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. RICH. There is requested in this bill for the division of grazing control the sum of $250,000 in order to administer this grazing matter.

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman say it is not going to cost anything?

Mr. PIERCE. Surely.

Mr. RICH. Are we not asking the Federal Treasury to spend this money?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes; to start the operation of the law. How is the man with cattle or sheep going to know what he has to pay until the law is put into operation?

Mr. RICH. Each year we will have additional expenditures, because we have never yet seen a bureau that, once it got started, it did not increase in personnel and expense.

Mr. PIERCE. The Forest Bureau has brought in money every year. They have brought money to the Federal Treasury. We are not losing on the Forest Service. It is bringing in money all the time. Money comes into the Public Treasury from reclamation projects, and that money all comes out of western lands. The people of Pennsylvania never contributed anything to the reclamation projects, until recently, since the days of the P. W. A.

Mr. RICH. Money is being spent out there for a great many of these projects and it all comes out of the Federal Treasury. The gentleman says we in Pennsylvania do not pay it, but may I remind the gentleman that Pennsylvania is responsible for one-tenth of the Federal income which goes into the Public Treasury.

Mr. PIERCE. I say to the gentleman that he has not contributed a cent, until these recent projects were allotted money by the Public Works Administration last year, and I am proud of the fact that the President did that. Of course, it will take years to develop those projects, such as the Grand Coulee, or any of those that money is being spent on today. For instance, it will take years to build reservoirs, then more years to put the land into condition where crops can be successfully grown.

Mr. Chairman, this irrigated country of the West is the location of the future subsistence homesteads of America. That is where the people will have to go. Most valuable, indeed, will be the irrigation projects of the West to safeguard the future food supply of our Nation.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield. Mr. CULKIN. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman how much Grand Coulee will cost.

Mr. PIERCE. I have looked up the records since I talked with the gentleman in the lobby yesterday, and I find the figures vary from $176,000,000 to $240,000,000 and $320,000,-000 for the completed work. Grand Coulee takes in about 1,000,000 acres of irrigable land.

Mr. CULKIN. One dam will cost $125,000,000.
Mr. PIERCE. My figures mean the completed irrigation works, with all the ditches and the drainage; also they mean with electricity fully installed. One-third-about $80,000,-000-is for electric power. Grand Coulee will be a great garden spot in the years to come.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Grand Coulee will take in and serve territory not only in the State of Washington, but will take in territory in Idaho and parts of Oregon and western Montana, will it not?

Mr. PIERCE. It is a great, big project in Washington, most valuable to the entire Nation, especially to the States named. When you consider the money that has gone into western irrigation, you should realize that more people can where Government money has developed them than could live on agriculture in the entire State of Pennsylvania.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I will be pleased to instruct the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. My whole thought and purpose is with respect to dual control of grazing which is now under the Department of Agriculture, while at the same time we are setting up a bureau under the Department of the Interior to handle grazing on public lands. As a business proposition, it seems to me what we ought to do is to put grazing under one department. It does not make any difference to me which department it is, whether Agriculture or Interior Department. I am not talking about these dams. The projects you have out in the West may be all right, but I think that so far as the control and operation of the grazing lands in this country are concerned, that ought to be under one department, whether it be the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior. I am not talking about the development of these various dams and irrigation projects.

Mr. PIERCE. Had I been in power, the public domain would have been placed under the Forest Service. I should not like to see the Forest Service, which has been built up after strenuous work through so many years, decapitated and turned over to the Interior Department. There are trained officials in that Service who have won their way into high esteem by fair treatment of the men who have allotments for grazing sheep and cattle on the forests. The Forest Service has ingratiated itself into the good will of practically all the West. I think the public domain should have been put under their control.

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentleman that he knows more about this than I do-

Mr. PIERCE. I surely do.

Mr. RICH. And I will go along with the gentleman from Oregon in putting it under the Department of Agriculture instead of setting up this new bureau in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. PIERCE. Just think how our people feel about this in Oregon. Over half of our State not on the tax rolls. Just recently there has been an Executive order issued to take $675,000 to buy a ranch in one county in Oregon to turn over to the birds. This takes one-tenth of the assessment roll of that county. Western people deeply resent these things.

I am introducing a bill providing that where an Executive order takes land off the tax roll, purchased for a bird refuge or for other public purposes, an appropriation shall be made in lieu of taxes that would have been collected. The half of our land not on the tax roll includes valuable forests worth millions upon millions of dollars, and then to have a few men from the East eternally talking about diverting some of our money makes our people in the West very resentful. They cannot understand your position here in the Money from P. W. A. has been earmarked for many dif-ferent projects. The administration in allotting P. W. A. money for irrigation projects is looking forward to real subsistence homesteads, 8, 10, or 15 years from now. The Grand Coulee project that you hear so much about, which is just across the line in Washington, will give homes to many thousands of people.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Do not the gentlemen on this side forget that Mr. Greeley admonished all the young men to "Go West, young man, go West", and now they are West and they want to make orphans out of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The distinguished Governor from Oregon knows how much I value his views, and I would like to have him tell me for my own purposes how he reconciles his known opinions about crop control with the purposes of the administration with respect to reclamation?

Mr. PIERCE. The reclamation projects for which P. W. A. money is being allotted, like the Grand Coulee project, are long-time projects. It will take 10 or 15 years to bring them into crop production. The administration is looking forward to these projects as subsistence homesteads.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Nevertheless, does not the gentleman feel this is a bad time to bring more land into cultivation?

Mr. PIERCE. They are not going to compete now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, day before yesterday we had our perennial tirade against reclamation. It was so vicious and so hot that it could not be printed yesterday, and I imagine that the Government had to use asbestos paper to have it printed in the Record. There was not only an attack on reclamation but also an attack on Dr. Mead, on Secretary Ickes, and on President Roosevelt.

Now, I do not hold any brief for these three gentlemen; they can well take care of themselves. I want to say that Dr. Mead has been a friend of reclamation. Since 1902 he has had a new problem to meet; mistakes have been made, but he can well be proud of what he has accomplished.

As to Secretary Ickes, I will say that I have the highest respect for that gentleman. [Applause.] He has held tightly the purse strings of the $3,000,000,000 that we appropriated over a year ago, and he has not been frightened by any threats nor cajoled by any flattery; he has gone on his way regardless of praise or criticism.

With reference to President Roosevelt, may I say that, although he comes from New York, he is broad-minded enough to consider the welfare of the whole United States.

When he came out West last summer he came to Bonneville and the Coulee Dam, and to paraphrase what is said of Caesar, "He came, he saw, and was convinced that if the Columbia Valley was developed it would redound to the benefit of all of the people of the United States."

May I say that the Coulee Dam was visited? The Coulee Dam happens to be—a part of it—in my district. The north part is in the district of Sam B. Hill and the southern part is in my district. It possibly may be called a bridge between the two hills of eastern Washington. [Laughter.]

The President came out there and he was convinced that when completed it will be a benefit to the whole Nation. It is not a county project; it is not a State project; it is for the whole Nation; and I prophesy that 7 years hence when it is completed it will be a monument to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Perhaps it is not as beautiful as the shaft that is raised down here to General Washington, or as stately as the memorial to Lincoln, but it will be a splendid memorial to the foresight, the wisdom, and the courage of Franklin D. Roosevelt and of lasting benefit to the people of the United States. I am glad that it is in my district.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No; the gentleman has his own time. It has been suggested by some of the opposition that this is money taken out of the Treasury. I want to emphasize for the Record and the people of the United States that this fund was raised out West; it is our fund. [Applause.]

It does not belong to the people of the United States. It is our special fund; a reclamation fund for reclamation purposes. If the gentleman from New York will read pages 105 and 106 of the hearings of the subcommittee, he will find that we have paid back up to 1934, with the exception of two small districts, from 98 percent to 100 percent. Again I emphasize it: We have paid back into our own reclamation fund!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, it has also been said that there is competition. It has been emphasized here that only 1 percent of the products of irrigation comes into competition, if you so call it, with the products from other parts of the United States. I call attention to the fact that in Iowa alone there is more than we have in all the irrigation districts combined. It is only a drop in the bucket as far as competition is concerned. The gentleman has spoken of overproduction. Is there any man in the United States who will say that there is overproduction when there are millions today starving and millions today that are in want of clothing and other necessities? There is no overproduction: it is only underconsumption and maldistribution. If we will bring back the purchasing power of the laboring group and the unemployed by giving them shorter hours and decent wages, there will be no surplus in the United States. [Applause.] If we will give a square deal to the farmers throughout the United States by giving them, until they can get on their feet. a reasonable rate of interest under the Frazier-Lemke bill, if we will give them the price of production and bring back their purchasing power, there will be no overproduction.

If these men who are so concerned about irrigation in the West will spend some of their time in seeing that some of the big racketeers in the United States shall forever be stopped from reaping all the profits and controlling most of the wealth of the United States, possibly then we will have money to buy up all the food and all the cotton in the whole United States. Right here may I say that in 1929, to show what has resulted from the economic policies advocated by this man who talked to us yesterday and talked to us the other day, 504 men in the United States received a net income equal to the gross income of 2,300,000 cotton and wheat farmers in the United States. No wonder the farmers are broke. No wonder they have no purchasing power. Why does not the gentleman use his talents and energies and correct that economic problem instead of striking at our irrigation in the West.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. If the gentleman will leave his provincial New York and come out West, if he will take a trip through the West, he will find, for example, the city of Denver, built up by irrigation. In Idaho he will find Twin Falls and Boise. In Utah he will find Salt Lake City and Ogden built by the sunlight and water and the patience of those Mormon pioneers. In California he will find also the great city of Los Angeles, with more than a million and a half people, and the great Imperial Valley. Then he may come up to Washington and Idaho and find Lewiston and Clarkston and our great Yakima Valley and the Wenatchee Valley. I have here some pictures to show to this gentleman and the rest of you that the men who have come upon the reclamation projects out there are not ruined.

He will find photos of some corn 15 feet tall, some fine alfalfa fields and potato fields, and some fine herds of cattle and flocks of sheep and some splendid farm homes—all in the irrigated Yakima Valley. He will see what has been done throughout the whole West. In coming to the Yakima Valley he may see what has been accomplished by irrigation there—and now may I talk for a while about Yakima County? It is one of the 12 counties in my district. In 1900 it was mostly a sagebrush waste, just as you see there in that pic-There was about 13,000 population. The valuation was about $25,000,000. We spent $33,000,000 of our own western reclamation fund money in that Yakima Valley and today the population is 77,000 and the valuation something more than $233,000,000. That was accomplished after spending only $33,000,000 in irrigation. The products of the Yakima Valley were worth $35,000,000 last year. Why this reclamation? It was said that Greeley told the young men | to go West. "Westward the course of empire takes its way."

But we have gone as far West as we can, and now there is only one way in which to find homes for these people in the Midwest, and throughout the drought-stricken territory, and that is by reclaiming the land. I may tell the gentleman that in 6 months of 1934, 4,000 families came into Washington seeking homes. If these dust storms continue that we have been reading about the last day or two, we expect 20,000 more families coming and asking for homes, and we are going to give those people homes in the West. Let the gentleman come out and see what we have in the West. We invite all to come out and visit the West. We have an exhilarating climate, wonderful scenery rivaling the Alps, virgin soil, sparkling streams, hospitable people, and limitless natural resources. It is a land of great possibilities and opportunities. It is called the "land of the setting sun." It is rather the land of the rising sun of peace and plenty and progress. We have distress, it is true, the same as all other sections, due to the depression. It will eventually be the home of millions of contented farmers who voluntarily come from submarginal lands and drought-stricken areas. We invite you, my friends, to come there. Here are some of the mountain scenes. This is Mount Rainier, in the Cascades, whence we get water for our irrigation. All of these photos show what irrigation will do. Here is a blossom scene in the Yakima Valley, and here is the result in the fall-red Winesaps on the tree. That shows what is done by irrigation. The gentleman spoke about the vitamins in vegetables and fruit, claiming that there are more vitamins in the eastern apples. I think before the gentleman gets through he will realize that we have vitamins in our vegetables and our fruit, as shown by these apples which I got 2 or 3 days ago from a young 14-year-old friend of mine in Yakima, Miss Betty Anne Wilkins, daughter of the postmaster there. I think the gentleman will find that the vitamins of our fruit and apples will give us of the western country enough fight to meet him at any place at any time to protect our reclamation in the West. [Applause.]

We take great pride in our great State of Washingtonnamed after our first President. My home paper, the Prosser Record Bulletin, expresses my sentiments in that respect fully. I quote:

REASONS FOR PRIDE

Those of us who live in Washington should have more than sentimental reasons for our pride and loyalty to this State. These are fine of themselves but there are also many practical reasons justifying an enthusiasm for this State.

Do you who love Washington know:

That there is more of nature's beauty packed into Washington than in any other State?

That Washington leads the Nation in the lumber industry and that the largest stand of merchantable timber in the world is on the Olympic Peninsula?

That we have 5,000 industrial plants whose output exceeds a billion dollars per year, employing 400,000 workers?

That Washington ranks first in the United States for volume of food-fish products? That the pulp and paper output amounted to $42,000,000 in 1933, and will exceed that figure for 1934?

That one-third of the Nation's apple crop is grown in Wash-

That one-twelfth of the Nation's wheat is produced here?
That the relatively new oyster industry last year represented one-twelfth of the Nation's supply?
That it is estimated the coal deposits of Washington, at the present rate of consumption, would last 5,000 years?

That 19 percent of the Nation's hydropower is developed here, far exceeding that of any other State?

That dairying is a major activity and no spot in the world can meet dairy records established here, in quality and production? That Washington eggs and poultry command a premium on the

That washington eggs and pountry command a premium on the markets of the world?

That the largest airplane factory in the world is in Seattle?

That Washington's berry, bulb, and seed growth provides a splendid commercial enterprise with a promising future?

And so we could continue along the endless chain toward building this glorious State. If ever diversification of resources, of wealth, and of opportunity was glaringly evident, it lies within our borders. Can anyone question that American civilization will here reach its maximum objective—its greatest achievement? Living in the State of Washington is indeed a privilege.

My friend was very vociferous a few days ago in favor of preparedness, which leads to war. The gentleman was willing to build Macons and Akrons at $2,000,000 apiece to be sunk in a few minutes. The gentleman was willing to go to war and give $12,000,000,000 to foreign nations-which we will never get back-to destroy. He is willing to give billions for destruction, but when we are asking for a few millions to build up, for construction in the United States, to make homes for men, women, and children who are asking that we do so, he holds up his hands and says, "You must not use the taxpayers' money. You must not raid the United States Treasury." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to acknowledge the noble gift of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL1.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. That was not a bribe. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield. I am fond of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Zioncheck], but I refuse to yield to him.

I desire to gracefully acknowledge the apple from the State of Washington, but despite its handsome complexion I question its vitaminic quality as compared with those grown on land made and watered by God. May I mildly resent the vigorous pounding which the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL] just gave me. I plead not guilty to the indictment, and I assure the House that that castigation was entirely undeserved. I am not going to attempt to go over the ground which I covered in my remarks the other day. That, of course, would be unfair to all concerned, but what I wish to impress upon the Members of the House is that I have never opposed and will not oppose a going project on which western community life depends. What I have opposed is the extension of this policy of reclamation, and the exploitation of good Americans.

I wish to say to the gentlemen here who represent reclamation areas and reclamation States that they had better watch their step, because the people who are already on these western projects are watching your action here. I will say to the vigorous and interesting gentleman from Washington, that the Grange of his own State was against the Grand Coulee.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but that is an error.

Mr. CULKIN. I refuse to yield. The gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. That is an error just the same.

Mr. CULKIN. The grange of the gentleman's State was against this proposition. Men who are on these reclamation farms in other parts of his State are against this Grand Coulee. There have been repeated protests filed before the proper committees of the House and before the resources committees of the United States by men from the State of Washington who are on these reclaimed lands, and who know that if this project is put into work they will be absolutely destroyed. I say to the gentleman from Washington that his constituents who are on these reclaimed areas are going to call him to account and shorten his political life, unless he mends his ways. They are not going to permit themselves to be put out of business by this performance.

Now, there has been a good deal of bitterness here today, a good deal of declamation, and a good deal of misstatement. What I stand for on this proposition is the suspension of all activities while the Government is spending $500,000,000 to plow stuff under and to retire 36,000,000 acres of land. That is my proposition. We should go no further in this direction. I may say to the gentlemen who have spoken what I said the other day—that this money that comes from under the ground is just as much a part of the funds of the United States as the moneys collected at the port of the city of New York.

I may add that taking the money of the East for reclamation purposes, preparatory to moving all our population into the open spaces of the West, is a moral and civic larceny.

I do not intend to bore you with a further statement of my attitude on this question. But I trust you will bear with me just a moment while I discuss one phase of the debate the other day, when some statistics were placed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Washington IMr. ZION-CHECK]. There were certain statements put into the RECORD with reference to the financial condition of these projects which I now desire to declare to be fallacious, misleading, and the product of synthetic bookkeeping. The average Member of the House, reading those records, would imagine that those projects had been paying their way. Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that during the progress of this reclamation proposition, as far as it related to Government enterprises, 50 percent of the Government disbursements have been written off in 90 percent of the projects attempted.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. STUBBS. I will not object if the gentleman will permit me to make one observation.

Mr. CULKIN. Certainly.

Mr. STUBBS. I will say that the gentleman need have no fear about the political future of my distinguished colleague from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL] or the gentlemen from any other Western States who are fighting for water conservation, for the preservation of the lives and homes of some of the finest people in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. Stubbs] for his contribution, but I want him to bear in mind the people who are being brought in on these lands and who are being exploited. They will speak with their ballots when the time comes.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. In just a moment.

Mr. Chairman, I question most earnestly the veracity of these documents, which, of course, were not prepared by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What foundation has the gentleman upon which to question them?

Mr. CULKIN. Now, I am going to confine my discussion of that to several Wyoming projects and give you the specifications. I wonder if the gentleman from Wyoming is

Mr. ZIONCHECK. He is present.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield. Mr. PIERCE. Would it not be fair to state that, where those projects have appeared not capable of paying off, it was a matter of mistaken engineering and putting the water where it should not have been put, and they should have known that, and they are not doing that today?

Mr. CULKIN. The Governor is a square man, and I will subscribe to almost anything he says; but they have all been written off 50 percent. I will say that 90 percent of them have been written off 50 percent.

Mr. PIERCE. But that was a mistake in engineering.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will examine the records, he will find that to be true.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What is the gentleman's authority for the statement?

Mr. CULKIN. The history of the whole proceeding.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Where does the gentleman get his

Mr. CULKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Washington that I am preparing a detailed statement on each of these projects. It will take some days to complete, but I will put it in the RECORD and I will go even further than that. I will mail a copy to the gentleman in advance and tell him when I am going to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I should appreciate it very much, I assure the gentleman.

Mr. CULKIN. I wish to call attention to several Wyoming projects. You remember the other day one of my main objections was to the Casper-Alcova project as being unnecessary; and in the course of the debate on that question the able gentleman from Wyoming stated that he knew and lived near the Shoshone project and that it was an excellent project. The Shoshone project represents an approximate investment by the Government of $5,000,000, and half of that has been written off. There has been a moratorium on that project for 15 years; not a cent has been paid. The Garland phase of it is excellent, as I understand, but the Wellwood and Frannie phases of it were sour land, like the Casper-Alcova land. There are 50,000 acres, as I am advised, 50,000 acres that are yet open to settlement. Yet in the face of that $27,000,000 is allocated to Casper-Alcova in the same State, not out of your beloved revolving fund, but out of the Treasury of the United States.

The Riverton project in the bill carries absolute corroboration of what I am going to say. There are 32,000 acres there, of which 3,000 acres are in use and 29,000 acres are not settled, although they have water on them. That has had a moratorium for 5 years. The Government spends, as the pending measure shows, $25,000 a year for pumping, and collects back $3,000.

I want to say just a word, and I do it with a good deal of trepidation because I love the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, about the Umatilla project in Oregon. There the Government disbursed $2,000,000 and put water on 40,000 acres. Of this area 10,000 acres are in use and 30,000 are not in use. It is one of the many projects that has been abandoned by the Government, so far as collections are concerned.

In a recent article in Collier's Weekly the Vale and Owyhee projects were criticized by Secretary Ickes, the gentleman so eloquently eulogized by the grateful gentleman from Washington. In this article Secretary Ickes said these projects should never have been power projects.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for 2 additional minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. The Umatilla project, or what we call now Hermiston, is recognized by everybody in the country as having been an engineering mistake, and was so recognized when the water was turned on. If the water had been turned on the land at Stanhope, or Bitter Creek, or at the Buttes south of Echo, there would have been no failure; but on that project there was 300 feet of solid sand, and, of course, the water disappeared; yet other projects around there have been a success. That was purely an engineering mistake.

Mr. CULKIN. How about the Okanogan project?

Mr. PIERCE. I am not familiar with the Okanogan project.

Mr. CULKIN. It is in the gentleman's State.

Mr. PIERCE. I am familiar with the Yumatilla project.

Mr. CULKIN. On the Okanogan project they have written off $950,000, and it cost the Government $1,200,000.

Mr. PIERCE. It is recognized by everybody that the Umatilla project, or Hermiston, was a great big engineering

Mr. CULKIN. What I protest against, Mr. Chairman, is the extension of those projects which are destroying my farmers and destroying the farmers in your own districts. I speak just as strongly for the farmer of the West as I do for the farmer of the East; and I say to you in all earnestness, in all seriousness, if you go blindly into this further land development, watch your step if you wish to continue to adorn the classic Halls of Congress. [Applause.].

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield for me to make a statement in reply to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GREEVER. I yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York does not know anything more about irrigation and reclamation than shown by the statements he has just made, he knows nothing. The gentleman said that our State grange in Washington is opposed to the Coulee Dam. I have been a lecturer of the State Grange two terms. I know what the State Grange stands for. It stands for the development of the Coulee Dam. Mr. King, the master of the State Grange, is a member of the Coulee Dam Commission that is now handling the Coulee Dam development. Still the gentleman from New York says our State Grange is opposed to it. Our farmers are not opposed to irrigation. They do demand a just settlement of our marketing problem—our economic system—as stated before. The gentleman from New York says that Marshall Dana is opposed to it. Marshall Dana is an advocate of the Coulee Dam. He was here not more than a month ago and advocated both the High Coulee Dam and the Roza. The gentleman had better get straightened out on his facts. [Applause.]

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEVER. I yield to the gentleman from New York. Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, may I say in response to the dictinguished warrior from Washington [Mr. Hill] that he has unintentionally and inadvertently misstated the facts. Of course, that is the retort courteous or quip modest. There is another and much uglier word I might use that is not proper in parliamentary circles.

I did not say that Marshall Dana was opposed to the Grand Coulee project. What I stated was that Marshall Dana agreed with me that the time for the development of the Grand Coulee project had not yet arrived; that it was 25 years or more in the future. Mr. Dana regarded me as a battler against uneconomic reclamation. By inference he paid me that compliment, which was probably an overcompliment. Mr. Dana made an informal stipulation to the effect that the organization of which he was president, which represented the reclamation States of America, would oppose the proposition for a quarter of a century to come.

The gentleman from Washington stated that the Washington Grange did not oppose the Grand Coulee project. That is passing strange, to say the least. I have read that in print a half dozen times, that they were opposed. I had a conference with Mr. Taber, of the National Grange, and I think he is now national master, and he went to the White House to protest to the President against the Grand Coulee being put in work.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. The Washington Grange is the organization about which I spoke.

Mr. CULKIN. That was the attitude of the National Grange, and despite the gentleman's statement I am going to insist that that is the attitude of the National Grange now.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. But not the Washington Grange.

Mr. CULKIN. And the Washington Grange.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Absolutely not.

Mr. CULKIN. We will find out. Mr. KNUTE HILL. But I know.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, I want to mention that a few things said by the gentleman from New York are highly inaccurate so far as Wyoming projects are concerned. The other day he made some very uncomplimentary remarks about the Casper-Alcova project. Now he has gone up into my own county and attacked one of the finest reclamation projects in the entire United States. I say with all due respect that he certainly shows a great degree of misinformation, because I happen to know nearly every foot of that land personally.

The Shoshone project is composed of five parts. Three of those parts are constructed. One of them is the Garland project, and I have here for the gentleman's information some pictures which show most of that project and the crops raised thereon, as well as the homes. I want to say to the gentleman that there is not any land in the Garland division of the Shoshone project but what is under cultivation, and under productive cultivation, except a comparatively small amount that was eliminated on account of seepage under a reclassification of the lands.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, with regard to the Wellwood division, which has been recently constructed in that project, it was settled just as fast as they could get the land ready for the settlers to come in. The gentleman talks about whether we from Wyoming and the other Western States will come back to the Congress of the United States. May I tell the gentleman right here and now that we are not half as much interested in whether we come back to the Congress of the United States as we are to do something of a progressive nature for the United States and for our country as a whole while we are here. [Applause.]

May I tell the gentleman something else? Upon those projects that have been instituted in the State of Wyoming and at other places they have provided the finest homes and the finest farms that may be found anywhere, and I have never heard a farmer upon a reclamation project in the State of Wyoming or anywhere else that made the statement that he did not want further reclamation developed, because those people out in our country are not that selfish, I may say to the gentleman from New York.

I call the gentleman's attention also to the fact that up until the Public Works Administration was instituted reclamation had not cost the United States one cent. I have the figures before me which show the amount of money contributed. The Western States, from public-land funds and oil royalties, have contributed to the Reclamation Service a total amount of $157,000,000. The sum of $205,000,000 has been spent upon these projects. Today the figures show that 98.6 percent of the moneys that have become due have been paid, and I do not think that there is any other business on the face of the earth that can make a better showing.

The statement is made about taking people off of submarginal lands. They take them off of these poor lands in the Eastern States that have not been kept up properly. They want to put them on subsistence homesteads. The finest and most economical thing they could possibly do, not only from an economic standpoint but from the standpoint of health and from many other standpoints of a social character, is to put them upon these reclamation projects, because those units are self-sustaining. You will find those people are raising the food that they eat, and that each one of those farmers is an independent economic unit, and that is something you cannot say of some other agricultural communities.

The West has never asked that this be given to them. I may say that of the $40,000,000 in oil royalties that has gone from the State of Wyoming as well as the contributions from the public lands—and I am only citing Wyoming as an instance, because the same thing happens in the States of California and Colorado and the other Western States—all of this money that has come from the depletion of the natural resources of these States, every cent of it that has been put into the reclamation fund, has been from this source. The only thing the West has done is to ask that in the great constructive policy the United States Government return to it a part of the resources which have been depleted and taken away from these States; and, for one, I believe this is a sound economic policy. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Examination and inspection of projects: For examination of accounts and inspection of the works of various projects and divisions of projects operated and maintained by irrigation districts or water users' associations, and bookkeeping, accounting, clerical, legal, and other expenses incurred in accordance with contract provisions for the repayment of such expenses by the districts or associations, the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1935 is continued available for the same purpose for the fiscal year 1936.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, from the remarks that have been made this afternoon I can fully appreciate that what I attempted to show yesterday was entirely misunderstood. What I said, or attempted to say, was in the interest of those farmers residing and operating within the States of California, Utah, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and Wyoming; and in support say, I want to point this out.

Colorado, you will find, is the greatest producer of sugar beets and beet sugar in the United States, and I think you will find California ranks second, and probably Michigan ranks third, and I wish to repeat, in order to make it clear, that from the bill we have before us and the appropriations which are being made from the P. W. A. fund, and from Dr. Mead's testimony, it appears that something like $105,-000,000 is involved for the purpose of building irrigation works and extending irrigation projects in the Western States mentioned, and all for the purpose of increasing the production of farm crops, which are at the same time being retired and reduced through Agricultural Adjustment control in the Eastern States. Dr. Mead refers to the need of more water "to grow sugar beets, and to put as much labor on 1 acre of land as they had formerly put on 10, to make 10 times as much money when they had good crops.'

This $105,000,000 is being used to build irrigation projects and provide water for the production of sugar beets and beet sugar and other crops in the Western States at the very time the territory in Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana is being refused the right to grow sugar beets with which to supply sugar factories already built and now standing idle in the Eastern States because under the Jones Sugar Act the eastern growers and mill operators are not permitted to grow the sugar required for the nearby market within 100 miles of the factory and farms.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the gentleman from Colorado will pardon me and allow me to proceed a few minutes.

Out in the Western States at present you have a great producing area, and in the Eastern States, where the population is, we find the requirement for sugar, and it is bad statesmanship and economics to spend these hundreds of millions of dollars in the West when the farmers in the East are begging for the right to grow the sugar in the East the people there must have for their local needs. Sugar beets are sold by the farmer to the processors on a participating basis wherein sugar beets are paid for at a price depending on the price received for sugar.

Colorado, Utah, Idaho, California, Montana, and Wyoming, hundreds of miles away from the sugar bowls of the eastern consumers, must pay transportation costs to the far-away market. Under the participating contracts and the A. A. A. rules and the processing taxes, the beet grower, the sugar consumer, and those who pay taxes to raise this great P. W. A. fund are all vitally concerned in the economics of the plan from a national standpoint. There is no need to bring in the question of sectionalism. Under the Administration's "planned economy" scheme, the use of these P. W. A. funds in the Western States for this purpose cannot be logically defended.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I decline to yield.

This is because the farmers in Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana grow their sugar beets under participating contracts very similar to those of the farmers in the other Western States which I have previously mentioned.

Now, the question before us is, Wherein is there consistency in appropriating public funds and expanding the western territory and production of sugar entirely beyond the consuming capacity of the Western States and the movement of that sugar directly into the eastern territory, such as Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana, on a special rebate and price-concession basis, which, because of these participating contracts, is highly destructive to the entire operations of all the growers of sugar beets throughout the United States?

I have no objection to the production of sugar in the United States. I contend that our sugar consumed in the entire United States should be produced by the citizens of the United States whether those citizens be in Puerto Rico or Hawaii or the Virgin Islands—not the Philippines—but I do contend that the farmers residing within continental of what my friend the gentleman from New York had to United States should first have the right to produce that sugar which is consumed within continental United States. and then, if there is any excess required, let it come from the islands which are operating under the American flag, in preference to Cuba to the end that our own people may produce our own requirements of this great basic food product.

So what I pointed out yesterday, which I desire to repeat, is that there is no justice to the farmers in the Western States-Colorado, Utah, Montana, Idaho, and Californiain extending through P. W. A. funds their production twelve, fifteen, or twenty million bags beyond the consuming capacity of the western territory and dumping it into the eastern territory, such as Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana, where beet sugar is produced, at the very time the acreage in Michigan and Ohio is being restricted under the rules and regulations issued by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration under the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act, and, particularly, when the States of Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana do not require P. W. A. funds to provide water for the crops they desire to grow. Private investments in farms and in factories should be protected first before taking public funds in this hour of need and going out and building more irrigation projects to produce crops to compete with land and buildings held by private individuals who are not permitted to utilize this land because of governmental rules and regulations. Farmers desire to be free to switch their lands from one crop to another in order to preserve the fertility of the soil and take advantage of better prices. It is not true that the growing of beets was unprofitable until the passage of the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act. Sugar is a nonsurplus crop, and our necessity of import of this commodity creates a market for it which makes it profitable for our farmers to grow sugar beets. The Jones Act denies the right to the American farmer to grow the acres he desires. This is wrong in principle. Its introduction and operation closed mills in Michigan which operated in 1933. It is a violation of the right the American farmer takes for granted to be his. It is a doctrine which was concocted and wrapped up in a general plan to benefit the banks which largely control the sugar plantations of Cuba. It was a scheme to saddle on the American farmer, who wants to grow sugar beets, an alleged debt someone seems to think the American farmer owes to the large banks which invested their deposits in Cuban plantations

The operation of this law prevents the building of more mills in this country in which American workmen could engage themselves in processing the sugar beets Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana farmers desire to grow on farms which do not require P. W. A. funds to furnish them water. The operation of the Jones Sugar Act, together with the processing tax and benefit-payment feature, creates a parity price principle which when it disappears through the expiration of the act will leave the beet growers of this country in chaos. The parity-price feature makes it unnecessary for the processor to pay a just price to the grower of the beets, because the Federal Government guarantees in a way the farmer will receive parity, and this parity fund is created through the assessment of a tax against the consumer. Some may say all the sugar trouble is caused by the Philippine importations. That is not true at all. Sugar from the Philippine Islands is only a factor. A protected industry needs to keep its own house clean, because it benefits through the good will of the population which grants that protection. Sugar-beet growers and processors must watch their step while the sugar law is in effect, all to the end that bad practices and inconsistencies may be eliminated from this great and beneficial industry. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell:]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is not often I presume to take the time of this House; but when a man gets up here and talks about something he does not know anything about or makes misstatements, then it is time for him to be corrected.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. CUMMINGS. No; I have not time to yield.

I want to call your attention to the statement the gentleman made about all these factories out here that were denied the right to have sugar beets grown. The truth is those factories were built years ago and have been standing idle for years and did not want to grow beets during all the hard times, but now they want to grow them under the benefits of the Jones-Costigan Act. Beets are going to bring a fair price under this act, and they want to grow them, although the factories have been standing idle and had run down until they were not worth a continental.

When the gentleman talks about production of sugar beets in other States, I may say that Colorado grows more sugar beets than any State in the Union, and there is not a Government project in the State.

If all this country and all of this irrigated territory that they propose to bring under irrigation were in cultivation, it would not conflict with the beets grown in Michigan one particle. Our sugar is not what is interfering with the beets of Michigan; it is the sugar grown in the tropical islands and shipped into New York and New Orleans and refined there and shipped out into this entire territory. There is room in the State of Michigan and in the other territories for more than we can grow, and the sugar from the West is not competing with it at all. The sugar that is competing is the sugar produced by cheap tropical labor.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Under the reduction in beet production in this country ordered by the A. A. A., I do not believe we are going to produce enough beets in any State to affect the

Mr. CUMMINGS. You are not growing enough sugar beets to fill your quota, and they would not want to grow beets at all if it were not for the Jones-Costigan Act; and the sugar from Colorado is not interfering now, and never has interfered, and never will interfere with other sugar if they will make the tropical islands produce their sugar under similar conditions. The gentleman says they are under the American flag. I am willing for those people to grow all the sugar they want to grow, without any limitation whatever, if they will grow it under the same conditions we grow it in the United States. If they will let the labor work the same hours and pay the labor the same wages, they can produce sugar until the end of time and I will not say a word; but I do object when they produce sugar with labor that gets 15 or 20 cents a day when we are paying 40 cents an hour.

Mr. KNUTSON. How is the Cuban treaty, which increases the allotment of Cuban sugar to be shipped into this country by 300,000 tons, going to affect the beetsugar industry in this country?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It could not affect it at all as long as we have 1,550,000 tons production. We have the first right to the market for 1.550,000 tons.

Mr. KNUTSON. Suppose we produce 4,000,000 tons, how will that affect it?

Mr. CUMMINGS. An ordinary mill will grind about 15,000 acres production. An ordinary acre will produce about 2,000 pounds of sugar; in Michigan, 3,000 pounds.

Mr. KNUTSON. Someone suggests that that will mean 200 additional mills.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield. Mr. DONDERO. How does the gentleman justify the restriction on the growing of sugar in this country when we raise only about 26 percent of what we consume?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do not justify it at all, but the sugar market is being ruined by the sugar from the Tropics produced by cheap labor. My grandmother was Scotch, and she used to say, "Laddie boy, it is not what you want in this world, but it is what you get." [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Riverton project, Wyoming: For operation and maintenance, $25,000: Provided, That not to exceed $25,000 from the power revenues shall be available during the fiscal year 1936 for the operation and maintenance of the commercial system.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman a question. Can the chairman of the subcommittee tell the House what this item of $25,000 is in the Riverton project for operation and maintenance?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This $25,000 is for a power plant operated for commercial purposes.

Mr. CULKIN. My information is that the pumping station at that project is being maintained, and the maintenance does not come from the rentals. Is that correct?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I cannot carry all the figures of hundreds of items in my mind in detail. They put in a power plant, and my recollection is that this is for the purpose of the maintenance of that power plant.

Mr. CULKIN. Can the gentleman tell us how much the Government is going to get back of that $25,000?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman will find justification for this item on page 149 of the hearings. They say that although no appropriation is requested for the continuation of construction, it is proposed to operate the plant for delivery of power to the power company and such uses as may be required in connection with the operation and maintenance of the project.

I suggest the gentleman look at the hearings. They call this power plant the Pilot Butte power plant. It was built primarily to furnish power for construction work. The surplus power is sold under contract to the Mountain States Power Co. No appropriation is requested for the continuation of construction; it is proposed to operate the plant for the delivery of power to the power company and such uses as may be required in connection with the operation and maintenance of the project. For 1934, $20,000 was made available from power revenues and for 1935, $25,000 was authorized from the same source and for 1936, $25,000 is requested.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman is familiar with my attitude on this proposition of not handicapping any existing project, despite the vigorous attacks made on me today, rather unjustly, of course, although I enjoyed them. I understand that on this project there are 32,000 acres, and only 3,000 in use. Can the gentleman tell me anything about that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the hearings fully explain this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of any appropriation in this act for the Bureau of Reclamation shall be used for investigations to determine the economic and/or financial feasibility of any new reclamation project.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think a general aspect of the reclamation projects has been ignored entirely by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin]. It seems that every depression that the United States has suffered heretofore has been gotten out of by building capital goods, going west, building railways, factories, towns, and exploiting new mineral deposits. The reason we are suffering in this present depression is that we can go no farther west without going into the Pacific Ocean. The frontier as such is gone. We will have to retrace our way a little bit, but at the same time build capital goods. The Public Works Administration is allotting something like $105,000,000 for the construction of dams; building flumes and ditches on the 17 reclamation projects is really building capital goods. It is one way out of the depression, although it is not a complete remedy by far. I think that is one factor that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin] entirely ignores. Were it not for the West, the depressions heretofore suffered by the eastern people would have been depressions like the present one; but as long as the people could go west and build railroads and towns and factories, they provided money for the farmer and the business men of the East and they have prospered because of this expansion heretofore. In view of the fact that the present reclamation and irrigation projects are self-sustaining and are paid by the people on the projects—the money is really theirs, though it must go to the Treasury and be appropriated—I think there can be no legitimate objection to it.

The argument has been made here that it is inconsistent for the Department of the Interior to spend the public money in reclaiming land, while the Department of Agriculture spends money to take land out of cultivation. I hold no brief for the triple A. Mr. Wallace doubtless has plenty to answer for. Possibly this criticism of reclamation may find some justification if it is limited to certain States where conditions of soil and climate are least conducive to fertility. But I do say with no uncertain emphasis that the criticism falls flat when applied to the Grand Coulee or any other of the projects on the marvelous soil of eastern Washington.

Here the chemistry of Nature has mixed a compound that needs only water to make it lush with verdure that would delight the soul of any farmer in America. That is the soil that has sent the fruits of Washington to the markets of the world. Wenatchee apples do not compete with American orchardists. They go through the canal and across the ocean in shiploads by the score. Furthermore, there can be no competition with something which is unique of its kind.

The Department of Agriculture is trying to take submarginal lands out of use. Well, it is true that there are large numbers of people on land so wretchedly poor that it is impossible to scratch out of it even a meager living.

Perhaps it would be a good thing for these people if the Department of Agriculture put them anywhere else except in the bread line. If they have to be put in the bread line, they would better have stayed on the land.

But if it is a question of a sound economic alternative, then there is no question at all that it is better business to turn back the lean and arid lands to the prairie and the forest, and put its half-starved habitants on land that will blossom under their hands. Lastly, let me remind you that this land reclaimed from the valleys and plains of Washington will stay there after you have reclaimed it. It will not float through the air and deposit itself over the surrounding States.

These reclamation projects fit into our President's rehabilitation program. As I understand it, he proposes to move many farmers from submarginal lands to reclaimed lands which will abundantly produce when water and labor are applied, and thus furnish a decent livelihood for those that till this productive soil. The argument of overproduction is unsound, for as my colleague [Mr. KNUTE HILL] has said, the problem today is a problem of underconsumption. May I end by saying that there is plenty for all if we work out a sane and sensible scheme of distribution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Helium production and investigations: The sums made available for the fiscal year 1936 in the acts making appropriations for the War and Navy Departments for the acquisition of helium from the Bureau of Mines shall be transferred to the Bureau of Mines on July 1, 1935, for operation and maintenance of the plants for the production of helium for military and/or naval purposes, including laboratory gloves, goggles, rubber boots and aprons, purchase, not to exceed $2,500, and exchange as part payment for maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use in field work, and all other necessary expenses, and including $11,300 for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question. I am very much interested in the appropriations for helium gas as described on page 72 of the bill. Does the gentleman know whether or not the sums to be transferred from the War and Navy Departments mentioned in this paragraph constitute an increase over the amount appropriated last year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They asked for $110,000 this year, and they are asking for $100,000 next year.

Mr. WEARIN. Is that more than was appropriated at the last session of Congress?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The amounts for these purposes are in the Army and Navy appropriation bills.

Mr. WEARIN. I understand that, but they are being transferred for the first time to the Department of the Interior. Or is that a general practice?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It has been done previously.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman does not know whether the sums in total amount to more than they did in the last session of Congress?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Ten thousand dollars less. That is entirely up to the Army and the Navy. It is just a question of giving money to the Department of the Interior or the Bureau of Mines to get the helium.

Mr. WEARIN. Was there anything brought out that indicated a contemplation of an increase in the amount of helium produced?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. We have nothing whatever to do about that. The question of the dirigible coming down and a decrease in the supply of helium came up, but we have nothing to do with that. The Bureau of Mines gets the helium in Texas and brings it to the surface, puts it into tanks, and it goes to the Army and Navy as they need it.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is hereby transferred from the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, to the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Mines, all those activities of the Minerals Division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce con-Division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce concerned with economic and statistical analyses of mineral commodities, domestic and foreign, together with all employees, records, files, equipment, publications, and funds pertaining thereto, effective immediately; and there is hereby transferred from the appropriation, "Export industries, Department of Commerce, 1936", to the appropriation, "Economics of mineral industries, Bureau of Mines, 1936", the sum of $23,700;

Total, Bureau of Mines, $1,417,311.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In the past 200 years the material world has been virtually remade by man. Emerging from somnolent centuries of relative changelessness, man suddenly awoke to the boundless wealth and power that lay hidden in the earth-and took possession of them. By utilizing this wealth and power man has wellnigh mastered nature. Yesterday he shackled the earth with metal and made it his slave. Today, with metal, he is enslaving air, electricity, and light. The new culture envelops the earth and penetrates to every region, no matter how hitherto desolate and inaccessible. The new culture is a mineral culture. Modern civilization is based, almost entirely, on the use of metals and mineral fuels.

The English nation has ranked first among modern nations in wealth and power because it was the first to discover and exploit its mineral resources. The industrial revolution began in England and flourished on coal and iron; it has progressed throughout the world so fast as minerals have been discovered and utilized by other nations. The industrial revolution would have been impossible unless there had first occurred a revolution in the use of minerals; and without the industrial revolution there could have been no British Empire. Nor would there have been an American Republic with world-wide prestige.

THE MINING INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES

That grand old American, Thomas Jefferson, conceived idvllic dreams of an agricultural America separated by an ocean from the turmoil of industry. But he dreamed without even guessing at the fabulous mineral wealth hidden in the American wilderness, and without foresight of the mechanical wonderland of today. How it would have alarmed him if some prophet had revealed to him that the United States and Great Britain, between them, would exploit 75 percent of the minerals of the world (V, 391). Not with agriculture, but with industry, our destiny has run, and industry would be still-born without minerals. "The minerals", says a recent writer, "are the essence of industrialism" (XI, 7).

The mineral wealth of the United States is more varied and abundant than that of any other region of the earth. Let us glance at a brief recapitulation of that wealth. The capital investment in the American mineral industry is estimated to be within twelve and fifteen billion dollars (XI, 5). With that investment, in 1929 the United States produced 35 percent of the world's coal, 67 percent of the world's petroleum, 37 percent of the world's iron ore, 47 percent of the world's copper, 36 percent of the world's lead, and 42 percent of the world's zinc (XIV, 25). Expressing these facts in different form, it can be shown that 40 percent of the value of the world's mineral production is produced within our borders; and if we add the minerals produced from sources under the commercial control of the United States, our percentage of the world's total mounts to 50 percent. By the exploitation of mineral fuels and water power, we produce nearly half of the mechanical energy produced in the entire world (V, 391). Statistics on the power and heat sources of the United States disclose that more than 53 percent of our power and heat are derived from coal, and more than 36 percent from oil and gas. In other words, the mining industry provides us with more than 89 percent of our heat and power, whereas less than 11 percent is derived from water power and other sources (compare VI, 13, and XI, 6).

American labor may be said to stand on a mineral foundation. In normal times, approximately 800,000 laborers work underground in the mines of America, and more than 1,700,000 are employed in all branches of the mineral industry. Coal mining alone furnishes more laborers with employment than any manufacturing industry (XI, 4). And it is not necessary to demonstrate the obvious fact that a vast majority of our industrial laborers are employed in the fabrication of minerals. Indeed, recent studies indicate that approximately 25,000,000 Americans, directly and indirectly, depend upon the mining industry for a livelihood (VI, 8).

Our transportation system has made the American Union possible. Railroads and steamships have bound the West to the East and the North to the South; they have brought the products of the hills, the plains, and the forests to the cities and returned the products of the cities to every corner of the continent. And it is not exaggeration to say that the mineral industry has made our transportation system possible, because 65 percent of the total freight carried by American carriers is furnished by the mineral industry and fabricated mineral products. Our mines are also making possible the rapid development of new forms of transportation, such as the airplane and lighter-than-air ships, whose efficient utilization still lies in the future.

The economic importance to the United States of the mineral industry is emphatically demonstrated by the fact that over the 10-year period beginning with 1923 the average annual value of mineral products was $4,466,300,000 (VI, 9); that is, annually the mineral industry adds to the total wealth of the United States commodities valued at approximately four and one-half billion dollars. Thus it adds to cur national wealth twice as much as that industry which is engaged in the manufacture of food and kindred products, 1½ times as much as the transportation equipment manufacturing industry, and more than 10 times as much as the rubber industry. (See appendix A.)

The average annual product of the mineral industry is less than that of agriculture, which is, of course, still our primary industry. However, the mineral industry annually adds to the wealth of the United States approximately as much as the average annual value of all farm crops produced and practically as much as the total annual value of all livestock and derivative commodities. (See appendix B.) Pursuing these revealing statistics a little further, it is interesting to compare the average annual product of one branch of the mineral industry-namely, metal mining-with specific agricultural crops. In the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 Congress established certain basic commodities, on which the agricultural structure of the Nation is indisputably based. No good purpose would be served by attempting foolishly to derogate the importance of these commodities. And yet the average annual production of the metal-mining industry, although slightly less than the average annual value of our corn crop, is approximately equal in value to that of our cotton crop, greater than our wheat crop, greater than our hogs, many times greater than our tobacco, and dwarfs to relative insignificance the average annual value of our rice crop. (See appendix C.)

Every State in the Union is engaged in the mining industry, and its direct influence is felt by every citizen. Accord-in different form, it can be shown that 40 percent of the value of the world's mineral production is produced within our borders; and if we add the minerals produced from sources under the commercial control of the United States, and of these two-thirds, or 2,024 counties, produce commercial minerals. The population of the mineral-producing counties of the United States in 1930 was 40,278,459 (VI 11)

THE MINING INDUSTRY IN UTAH

Nevertheless, it is true, startlingly true, that the Nation's, as well as the world's, store of minerals is confined to comparatively small areas. To illustrate this fact, let me call attention to the fact that since 1864 the State of Utah, one district of which I have the honor to represent, has produced 7,000,309 fine ounces of gold, 593,106,470 fine ounces of silver, 4,855,654,109 pounds of copper, 7,196,590,720 pounds of lead, and 984,274,157 pounds of zinc. The total value of this one small State's vast mineral output has been $1,814,314,105, of which the value of our gold production accounts for only $144,709,230 (I, 261). During the years 1913 to 1932 Utah produced approximately 7 percent of the world's production of silver, 7 percent of the world's production of copper, 7 percent of the world's production of lead, and 2 percent of the world's production of zinc (XII, 3). According to figures furnished by the Bureau of Mines, the area embraced within a 600-mile circle, drawn with Salt Lake City as its center, produced in the last 20 years 79.87 percent of all the gold. 91.9 percent of all the silver, 53.61 percent of all the lead, 77.47 percent of all the copper, and 26.55 percent of all the zinc produced in the United States, including Alaska (VIII, 47).

Likewise, it is true that in those areas rich in minerals the relative economic importance of the mineral industry increases to an almost incredible extent. In 1930, out of Utah's population of slightly more than half a million, 239,605 people, or 47.17 percent, were dependent on the metal-mining industry (VII, 5). In our State the mineral industry—

Employs one-third of the total number of employees carried by the State industrial commission, produces about one-third of the new wealth annually created in the State, and supplies four-fifths of all the railroad freight tonnage of Utah (VIII, 9).

The annual output of the mineral industry of Utah averages about $120,000,000. Eighty-five million dollars of this amount is immediately expended in the State for wages, freight, smelting, and supplies.

OUR STAKE IN MINING

Not only in Utah, but throughout the entire Rocky Mountain area, the mining industry is of paramount economic importance. The prosperity of the people of that area is almost wholly dependent upon the prosperity of the mining industry. No one has yet guessed at the incalculable wealth that is locked away in the mountains of our inland empire; but it is not too much to say that the future glory and greatness of our country will come largely from that area. America's stake in the mining industry is great beyond all measure. It is the duty of American political leaders to take cognizance of the importance of that industry. We cannot, we must not, lose our stake in mining. And the time has come when the Government must awaken to the needs of the mining industry and take steps to bring about a saner and more orderly utilization of our mineral wealth in the interests of the whole people.

During the years 1924 to 1928 the mining industry paid in Federal taxes almost six times as much as the agricultural industry. During those same years the Federal Government spent almost 50 times as much to protect agriculture as it spent to protect our mines. The mineral industry has stood on its own legs and has solved its own problems-sometimes wisely, sometimes unwisely. It does not ask for subsidies nor doles. It merely asks that the Government aid it with its technological problems and with those problems which involve the safety and welfare of mining labor. Only two Government agencies—the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey-are concerned principally with mining problems. In the past they have performed invaluable services, and they have ordered their work so that in the future they can render even greater service to the mines and the miners and to the country at large.

But previous Congresses have crippled their efforts by penny-wise dollar-foolish economies. It would be false economy, it would be blind leadership, to continue to imperil our stake in that industry, which produces half our wealth, by continuing these petty, unsubstantial, so-called "economies."

United States Department of the Interior, GEOLOGICAL SURVEY. Washington, February 2, 1935.

Hon. Abe Murdock,

House of Representatives.

My Dear Mr. Murdock: In reply to your telephone request of January 29:

The economic importance of the mining industry in the United States may be most broadly inferred from the national standard of living as compared with standards prevailing in the western of living as compared with standards prevailing in the western European countries from whose stocks our people are derived. All economists are agreed that our industrial civilization and the power age are dependent fundamentally upon the mineral resources of the Nation. In this respect, therefore, the importance of our mineral industries in the national economy is far greater than the statistics would indicate, yet even the statistical position of the mining industry is impressive. The total national income in 1928 has been estimated at roughly $90,000,000,000. Of this the mineral production, valued at $4,707,309,000, formed over 5 percent, the agricultural production about $11,816,000,000, or about 13 percent. Two-thirds of the railway tonnage is composed of the products of the mines. the mines.

Two-thirds of the rallway tonnage is composed of the products of the mines.

The long-time trend for several generations has been toward an increasing relative importance of the mineral industries and in the past generation this trend has become still more emphatic. For example, in the 30 years ending in 1929, the population of the United States increased 62 percent, the physical volume of agricultural production 48 percent, of manufactures 310 percent, of railroad freight 338 percent, and of mining products 386 percent. These figures are given in the article on Mineral and Power Resources by F. G. Tryon and M. H. Schoenfeld in Recent Social Trends, McGraw-Hill Book Co., New York, 1933.

In the State of Utah the relative importance of the mineral industry is far greater than in the United States as a whole. According to the Statistical Abstract of the Department of Commerce for 1930, the total value of farm products of the State, including both crop and animal products, was $67,500,000 in 1928. In the same year the mineral production was valued at $97,381,000, or 46 percent more. This comparison is, perhaps, still more striking if one notes that the entire sugar-beet crop of Utah was in that year worth only $4,478,000 and, according to the Fifteenth Census, the total capital value (not output) of all farm lands and buildings in Salt Lake, Utah, and Weber Counties, the three most thickly settled agricultural counties of the State, was only about $71,000,000. Thus the mineral output of the State for this one year was over 37 percent greater than the total value of the farms of its three most productive agricultural counties.

General information on the economic importance of the mineral industry is contained in Our Mineral Supplies, by H. D. McCaskey and E. F. Burchard; United States Geological Survey Bulletin 666, 1919, now out of print; and in the following publications:

You have doubtless already made a similar inquiry of the Bureau of Mines. This Bureau will be able to furnish you detailed statistical information regarding the amount and value of mineral production in Utah and the United States as a whole.

If it would be of service to you in connection with your inquiry, I should be pleased to arrange for one of our staff who is familiar with the mining industry of Utah to confer with you at your convenience.

convenience.

Very cordially yours,

W. A. MENDENHALL, Director.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the establishment and maintenance of public schools, Territory of Alaska, $4,000, together with the unexpended balance on June 30, 1935, for this purpose in the special fund, public schools, Alaska fund, to continue available until expended: Provided, That expenditures under such $4,000 shall not exceed the aggregate receipts covered into the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act, 1934.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this, Mr. Chairman, to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question with respect to the proviso. I really cannot understand the effect of this proviso on page 94, concerning the public schools, Territory of Alaska. I understand the first part makes an appropriation of $4,000, plus the unexpended balance on June 30, 1935, of that part of the Alaska fund which has been collected, and which is on that date in the United States Treasury in a special fund; but then the proviso is that expenditures under such $4,000 shall not exceed the aggregate receipts covered into the Treasury, in accordance with section 4 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act of 1934. That would seem that no part of the $4,000 could be used or that the $4,000 is just put in there as some nominal sum. Then I am somewhat confused by the last part which does not state upon what date the receipts are to start. It may be entirely clear to the committee, but I do not quite understand it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In the first place, there is an unexpended balance of $56,000. This $4,000 down below refers really to that $4,000 up above and that is a direct appropriation, "for the establishment and maintenance of public schools, $4,000", a straight appropriation, together with the unexpended balance of $56,000. That makes $60,000 plus. The gentleman will recall that after this appropriation repeal act of 1934, we took a large amount of permanent appropriations and relegated them back to the departments, whereby we have to specifically appropriate them if we desire to do so, each year. This is one of those items that came to us from the permanent appropriation. We are just carrying it on practically the same as it was before.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that we purposely worked it out in this manner in order to save for Alaska $56,000 in this fund. If we had not appropriated that $56,000, it would have gone to the Treasury and would have been lost to Alaska. As it is, you are getting 25 percent of the occupational and trade tax for school purposes. This additional $4,000 is more than you will require for the coming year, because in the last 2 years you have only been using $50,000. From the 25 percent which you get from occupational and trade taxes, that money can be held in abeyance and we can appropriate it next year; and if you need more, we can give it to you. We took the position that if you needed $100,000 it would be all right, but we purposely took this fund that would be impounded and lost to you, and appropriated in addition to that $4,000, which is $10,000 more than you have demonstrated you have required in the past.

Mr. DIMOND. We have required it, but we have not obtained it. In the hearings before the committee, at pages 476 and 477, Mr. Burlew testified it seemed to be his impression that the bill, instead of carrying $4,000, should carry $50,000, which was written in the bill then, and, in addition to that, we should have this language which now appears in the bill, "together with the unexpended balance."

Mr. ZIONCHECK. May I ask the gentleman this: Did Mr. Burlew state that we should appropriate $50,000 in addition to the $56,000? Is that in his testimony?

Mr. DIMOND. I understood that.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. At what page does that appear?

Mr. DIMOND. Page 476 of the hearings.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If we take the position of appropriating $50,000 from the general fund you would lose the $56,000 which has accumulated.

Mr. DIMOND. Yes, of course.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And that would have gone to the Treasury and would have been gone forever as far as the Alaska schools are concerned.

Mr. DIMOND. The language that now appears in the first part of that paragraph, which reads as follows: "To-gether with the unexpended balance on June 30, 1935, for this purpose in a special fund, public schools, Alaska fund ". is absolutely necessary. Otherwise we would have lost the

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman not recognize that we are giving him $10,000 more than the Budget authorized?

Mr. DIMOND. Well, I do not remember the figures of the Budget estimate sufficiently to answer the question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Budget estimate was $50,000, and we are making available to you $60,000.

Mr. DIMOND. May I ask another question, then?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. DIMOND. Under the language as printed, the money that has been collected from the tax in Alaska and put into this school fund will not be lost? None of it will be lost this year or next year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh. no: not at all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House. together with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill, as amended, do

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6223) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill, as amended,

The bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. Schneider, for 4 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. Maloney, for 10 days, on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills, a joint resolution, and a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 51. An act for the relief of Frank Kroegel, alias Francis Kroegel; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 244. An act for the relief of Thomas Salleng; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 285. An act to reimburse the estate of Mary Agnes Roden; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 312. An act for the relief of Lillian G. Frost; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 313. An act to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of A. C. Messler Co.; to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 447. An act conferring jurisdiction on the United States District Court for the District of Oregon to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the suit in equity of Rakha Singh Gherwal against the United States; to the Committee on Claims

S. J. Res. 9. Joint resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. Con. Res. 5. Concurrent resolution to print and bind the proceedings in Congress and in the rotunda of the Capitol upon the acceptance in the Capitol of the statues of Caesar Rodney and John M. Clayton, presented by the State of Delaware; to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 3464. An act to amend certain sections of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, relating to descent and distribution.

KEEP THE RECORD STRAIGHT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, January 14, 1935, House bill 3896 was introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative Vinson of Kentucky, at the request of Mr. Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., national commander of the American Legion. At that time there were pending before the House of Representatives only three bills providing for full and immediate cash payment, as follows:

H. R. 1, by Patman, of Texas, provides for full and immediate cash payment, the payment to be made in United States notes, with the privilege extended to the Secretary of the Treasury to retire Federal Reserve notes in the event of danger of inflation. No interest would be charged on loans after October 1, 1931.

H. R. 2750, by Deen, of Georgia, immediate and full payment provided in Federal Reserve notes in return for a deposit of the veterans' certificates.

H. R. 2829, by Lundeen, of Minnesota, full and immediate cash payment as provided in H. R. 1, without deducting interest and with refund of interest paid; method of payment same as H. R. 1, but not the same as to the method of contracting currency in the event of danger of inflation, but guarded against inflation.

In addition to these 3 bills, there were only 7 other bills pending in the House of Representatives which provided for partial payment or in any manner dealt with the payment of the adjusted-service certificates, which were introduced prior to January 14. They were as follows:

H. R. 9, by Celler, of New York, does not provide for immediate payment, but does provide for partial payment in full settlement.

the rate of $50 per month to those in need.

H. R. 131, by Celler, of New York, a part-payment bill at the rate of $30 per month to those in need.

H. R. 2019, by Griffin, of New York, a part-payment bill in full settlement.

H. R. 2860, by SEARS, of Florida, a part-payment bill in full settlement.

H. R. 2888, by Lea of California, a part-payment bill in full settlement.

H. R. 3267, by Fish, of New York, a part-payment bill in five equal installments, commencing July 1, 1935.

COMMANDER BELGRANO MISINFORMED

It will be noticed that there were only three full and immediate cash payment bills pending at the time H. R. 3896 was introduced-H. R. 1, H. R. 2829 (the Lundeen bill), and H. R. 2750 (the Deen bill) - and it will be noticed that the Lundeen bill is the same as H. R. 1, except the feature in regard to interest paid and a control for preventing inflation.

Evidently the one who obtained the information for Commander Belgrano did not give him the correct facts, as Commander Belgrano and his official family did, on January 14, and at different times thereafter, give as his reasons for causing to be introduced in the House of Representatives H. R. 3896 the following:

First. That more than 40 bills had been introduced in Congress providing for the immediate payment of the certificates; that practically every one offered some different method for raising the money.

Second. That some bills provided for payment in silver. Third. That some bills provided bonds with schemes of taxation to pay the bonds.

Fourth. That some bills provided that it be paid by infla-

Fifth. That the Senate is not in favor of the Patman bill, and a bill should be introduced and passed in the House that the Senate will favor.

Sixth. That the American Legion never recommended to Congress a particular method of payment.

REASONS FOR OPPOSING H. R. 1 ANSWERED

I have carefully checked these bills with the clerk of the document room to make absolutely sure that the statement in regard to these bills is absolutely accurate.

Therefore, the statement that there were so many bills introduced that the issue was beclouded and there were so many plans pending for the payment of the certificates that the success of the veterans' program was threatened was an incorrect statement; in view of these facts, that cannot be

I will answer Mr. Belgrano's reasons for causing H. R. 3896 to be introduced in the order in which they have been out-

First. There were only 3 bills providing for the immediate payment of the certificates and not 40.

Second. No bill was pending which provided for the payment in silver.

Third. No bill was pending which provided for bonds with a scheme of taxation to pay the bonds.

Fourth. No bill was pending that provided for the payment by inflation.

Fifth. The Senate has reversed itself since it defeated our bill on June 17, 1932, which provided for the payment as provided in H. R. 1. Since that time the Senate has on a number of occasions voted to let national banks and Federal Reserve banks obtain money in return for deposits of 1945 obligations in the same way that we propose in H. R. 1, and practically every Senator has voted for such proposals. Further, when the bill leaves the House it will go to a Senate committee; the House should be allowed to pass the bill that it has expressed a preference for by tremendous majorities heretofore. Any changes can be made in the Senate that will cause the bill to receive the most votes and carry out our purpose to get the certificates paid in full immediately. When this bill passes the Senate, a committee from each body, known as a "free conference committee", will

H. R. 39, by Martin of Colorado, a part-payment bill at | iron out the differences between the two Houses. The bill that is agreed upon by this free conference committee providing for full and immediate cash payment will meet with my approval and will receive my support.

Sixth. Probably the Legion has not heretofore recommended a particular method of payment. The Miami resolution, however, directs that the payment be made in a way that no additional debt will be created. Although H. R. 1 was not specifically endorsed at the convention of the American Legion at Miami, the bill does carry out the terms of the resolution. No one can contend that an additional debt will not be created if we pay a debt now with interest-bearing bonds that is not payable until 1945.

DIFFERENT METHODS USED ON TRIAL BALLOONS

In the beginning of the campaign for paying the adjustedservice certificates in 1929 and 1930 we tried different methods of payment in order to gain public approval. We were unsuccessful in our efforts to make headway in this direction until we proposed the method of payment provided in H. R. 1, which requires no bonds, no taxes, and will save the Government a billion and a half dollars. We would never have gained public attention and approval without a showing of this kind. The first question that would be asked when the payment of the certificates was mentioned was: "How can you justify the payment now, when they are not payable until 1945?" Our answer would be: "Yes; it is true the certificates are not payable until 1945; but the veterans were deprived of 7 years' interest, which, if given credit for along with a proper adjustment of interest on the $1 and $1.25 a day, the full amount was due October 1, 1931." Even this answer was not sufficient to get public approval without the further answer: "The debt can be paid in a way that it would not cost the Government anything, and the distribution of such a large sum of money into every nook and corner of the Nation would be helpful to the general welfare."

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, March 4, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARING

SENATE

Monday, March 4, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Heavenly Father, who hast sent Thine only Son to bring peace on earth and good will to men, grant that the purpose of His wondrous coming may speedily be fulfilled among the nations of the world by raising the minds of men everywhere above the mists of hatred and suspicion into the pure light of mutual trust and understanding.

Vouchsafe, we beseech Thee, Thy blessing and guidance to all efforts made in Thy name for the alleviation of distress throughout the Nation; and to those who are blind to Thy goodness send Thy Holy Spirit to open their eyes and show them the way of life, that our country may be relieved of its great burden of suffering and sin. Help us to share our gladness and our gifts with others, to the righting of wrongs, the defense of the weak, and the comfort of the sorrowful; that we may follow Him who with divine compassion and tenderness of soul ever careth for us with a love that never faileth—Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CLAIMS ON BEHALF OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS AND THEIR NATIONALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending the enactment of legislation for the purposes described therein.

The recommendations of the Secretary of State have my approval, and I request the enactment of legislation for the purposes indicated in order that this Government may meet the obligations outlined in the report.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 4, 1935.

(Enclosure: Report of the Secretary of State.)

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Resolution 40

Whereas the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia are producers of bauxite in large quantities and are capable of producing all the bauxite consumed in the United States; and Whereas the use of bauxite for the production of aluminum metal is a practical monopoly, there being only one company in the United States which the owners of the bauxite ore can sell to; and Whereas this monopoly purchases a large percentage of its ore in South America and imports same to the United States, because of the cheap labor conditions in South America; and

Whereas if the foreign ore was not permitted by tariff to enter this country there would be opened up in the States above mentioned many new mines and ore bodies that are now lying idle for lack of a market, and there is sufficient bauxite ore in the United States to take care of the demand for many years, and that if it were not for the competition of this foreign ore new mines would be opened up and labor created for a large number of men, estimated as high as 40,000, and that in addition to the direct employment of labor the railroads of the United States would benefit and railroad labor would benefit by the movement of this ore, which at the present time is moved by foreign ships from South America to the Atlantic seaboard ports and utilizing only a small proportion of the haul by American railroads: Now, therefore, be it *Resolved*, That the Members of the House of Representatives and the Senators of the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia be asked to take such steps as may be necessary in Congress to prohibit the importation of foreign bauxite, and that this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States; the Representatives in Congress of the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia; and to the legislatures of each of these States that may now be in session.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of House Resolution No. 40, by Christian, of Yell.

H. P. SMITH,

*Chief Clerk*. Whereas if the foreign ore was not permitted by tariff to enter

H. P. SMITH, Chief Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

> Senate Concurrent Memorial 3 Praying for tariff on raw asbestos

To the President and the Congress of the United States:
Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

spectfully represents:

That through the united action of those people, corporations, and monopolists directly interested in manufacturing asbestos products, the asbestos mining industry in Arizona and the United States of America has been forced to discontinue operations and discharge thousands of people employed by said mining industry. That the asbestos manufacturing industry of the United States and those directly and indirectly interested therein have succeeded in securing a high import duty on all foreign manufactured products and have persistently and continuously opposed the protection of the asbestos mining industry in this country by their insistence upon retaining the raw asbestos product upon the free list of tariffs upon imports.

It, therefore, appears that the reason for this activity on the part of the asbestos manufacturing industry and those persons interested therein is to secure for such industry a low cost of raw product advantageous only to the manufacturing industry, even at interested therein is to secure for such industry a low cost of raw product advantageous only to the manufacturing industry, even at the sacrifice of the asbestos mining industry of the United States, One of the principal purposes in having an import duty upon products imported into the United States is to promote, conserve, and protect the United States industry producing such product based upon this reason: The practice of protecting the asbestos manufacturing industry by levying a duty on the imports of the foreign product of this industry and not on the raw products of the foreign asbestos mining industry is manifestly unfair and destructive. destructive.

Raw asbestos can be mined and imported into this country much cheaper than it can be produced and mined here, principally because of the difference in the cost of labor in the United States cause of the difference in the cost of labor in the United States and foreign countries.

If the asbestos mining industry could be given the same protection that the asbestos manufacturing industry is given, the mining industry would be in a position to resume operations and thereby reemploy thousands of people and assist in lightening the taxpayer's burden of supporting and caring for many people who are now on relief rolls.

Wherefore your memorialist press:

who are now on relief rolls.

Wherefore your memorialist prays:
That Congress, in order to correct the condition now existing in the United States in the asbestos mining industry, enact the necessary legislation to place an import duty on foreign raw asbestos in accordance with the following schedule, which shows the type of raw product and the amount of import duty thereon deemed necessary to protect the United States asbestos mining industry:

All crudes at ... _ 20 cents per pound

And your memorialist will ever pray. Adopted by the house February 19, 1935 Adopted by the senate February 18, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Senate Concurrent Memorial 2

Praying for the relief of certain property owners of Santa Cruz County

To the President and the Congress of the United States: Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, re-

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

Through the establishment by the United States in 1898 of a 60-foot neutral strip of territory along the boundary between the United States and Mexico, the rights of persons owning property within said area were involved. Particularly were the rights of property owners within that portion of said neutral strip where the same passed through the territory now known as Santa Cruz County, Ariz., affected, inasmuch as the said strip at such location constituted a part of the city of Nogales, and later became what is now known as International Street in the said city of Nogales.

In the course of a determination of the rights of parties owning property within the said area, the Court of Claims of the United States on April 15, 1912, found that the following-named persons were entitled to compensation in the amounts set forth respectively, for the taking of their property within said neutral strip as it passed through Santa Cruz County: John T. Brickwood, $3,750; Edward Gaynor, $4,250; Theodore Gebler, $1,200; Lee W. Mix, $1.450; Arthur S. Peck, $2,350; Thomas S. Casanega, $500; Joseph D. Lusignan, $3,250; Joseph P. Berger, $1,800.

Despite the fact that said court found said persons entitled to compensation in the amounts above set forth, they have never been compensated for the loss of their property in accordance with the find of the court, or at all, a fallure which appears to constitute a clear violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States that private property may not be taken for public use without compensating the owner therefor. Wherefore your memorialist prays:

That the Congress of the United States enact the necessary legis lation to pay the persons above named the amounts awarded to them by the United States Court of Claims as compensation for the land taken by the United States in the establishment of said neutral strip along the boundary between the United States and

And your memorialist will ever pray. Adopted by the house February 21, 1935. Adopted by the senate February 13, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Senate Joint Memorial 2

On the construction of a highway to link reclamation projects on the Colorado River and connect with the proposed deep-sea channel to the Gulf of California

To the President and Congress of the United States of America: Your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

Development of the vast resources of the Colorado River represents one of the outstanding opportunities for the conservation of the Nation's wealth, for providing employment, for creating farm homes, and for developing recreational facilities for the nationals homes, and for developing recreational facilities for the nationals of this and other countries.

Along the lower Colorado River are a number of established or potential reclamation projects of large importance, and several dams have been constructed or are under course of construction which impound waters where refuges for wild fowl may be established, and where national-park projects, which will afford magnificent recreational facilities, are contemplated.

The dredging of a deep-sea channel from the head of the Gulf of California, through cooperation with the Republic of Mexico, a project which has long been considered, and which would immeasurably increase the commerce of the Southwest and add to the wealth of the Nation, would be a fitting climax to the comprehensive development of the Colorado River's resources.

Adjacent to the Colorado River, within the confines of Arizona, lies an area rich in both agricultural and mineral resources, including the manganese fields of southern Mohave County, the agricultural area of the lower Bill Williams, the Colorado River Indian Reservation, the Parker-Gila Valley reclamation project, the gold, silver, and lead districts of western Yuma County, and the agricultural empire, embracing the Yuma project and the incomparable education of these various sites and districts, with their incentionals and county and sight seers are recommended.

The joining of these various sites and districts, with their inestimable advantages to pleasure seekers and sight-seers, prospectors, and home seekers, would complement the development of the river's resources, stimulate industry, and make accessible to travel one of the Nation's most interesting areas.

Wherefore your memorialist prays: Wherefore your memorialist prays:

1. That the United States Government, through any of its agencies possessing authority for the construction of highways, or through the cooperation of two or more of such agencies, the Bureau of Public Roads, the National Park Service, the Civilian Conservation Corps, the Indian Bureau, or other agencies, construct a highway from Boulder Dam, adjacent to the Colorado River and on the Arizona side thereof through the districts abovementioned to a junction with the Republic of Mexico at San Luis and with the site of the proposed deep-sea channel to the Gulf of California

2. That if additional legislation be required or desirable for the consummation of this constructive improvement, the Congress enact the same.

And your memorialist will ever pray. Adopted by the house February 19, 1935. Adopted by the senate January 30, 1935.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

House Resolution 173

A resolution to memorialize Congress to continue Federal aid to school districts in financial distress

Whereas the Federal Government during the year of 1934 did grant to teachers employed by distressed school districts financial assistance by paying salaries to teachers, thus enabling many school children in the drought area to secure schooling who would otherwise have been denied it; and

Whereas such aid now being furnished will expire January 31, 1935, or within 21 days; and

Whereas while recognizing the State's responsibility to provide assistance to such distressed school districts, we must acknowledge that in the ordinary course of legislative action any financial plan devised will be too late to be of assistance during the present term; and

Whereas the financial crisis of the entire public-school system is bound to grow more serious, and will, unless aid is forthcoming, result in the loss of school privileges to at least 25 percent of the school children living on farms and in small towns, villages, etc.: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of Georgia respectfully and urgently memorialize the Congress of the United States to direct that the Federal Emergency Relief Administration continue the relief aid now being furnished to distressed school districts for the balance of this school term, or until such time as may be necessary to secure special State revenue for such purposes. In house, read and adopted February 26, 1935.

Andrew J. Kingery,

Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

Whereas it appears that there is a growing disagreement between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas when the President was inducted into office the people of this country were in despair and the future appeared without hope, and under the administration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt despair has been dispelled and the future seems hopeful; and Whereas the present impending rupture between the President

Whereas the present impending rupture between the President and Congress seems to have grown out of the problem of the dispensation of patronage; and

Whereas the machinations of prominent politicians, both within and without Congress, are seeking to embarrass the President and to further their own political interests: Now, it is the belief of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky that the people of America are, like the people of Kentucky, solidly behind the President and his program, and they further believe that the welfare of the United States demands that all Democrats and all loyal citizens support the policy of the President: Therefore be it be it

Resolved, That this body request all Democrats in the National Congress, and particularly the Members of the body from Kentucky, to support the President of the United States in his program of recovery and economic reform, both for the success of the Democratic Party and the good of our common country.

The clerk of this house is directed to forward to the President and to the Clerk of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States a copy of this resolution, to be communicated to each of said bodies, and to send to each Senator and Representato each of said bodies, and to send to each Senator and Representa-tive from the State of Kentucky a copy of this resolution. This resolution was adopted by the house of representatives.

J. ERWIN SANDERS Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolutions in favor of the adoption by the Senate of the United States of a resolution now pending before it relative to religious persecution in Mexico

persecution in Mexico

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts urges upon the Senate of the United States to adopt and carry out the provisions of the Borah resolution, so-called, now pending before said Senate, protesting the antireligious practices of the present rulers of Mexico, condemning the crueities and brutalities that have accompanied the campaign of the present Mexican Government against the profession and practice of religious beliefs in said country and providing for the conduct of hearings by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate and the receiving of such evidence by said committee as may be presented relating to religious persecution and antireligious compulsion and agitation in Mexico for the purpose of determining the policy of the United States with reference to this vital problem and in what way it may best serve the cause of tolerance and religious freedom; and be it further freedom; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In senate, adopted, February 15, 1935.
In house of representatives, adopted in concurrence, February

A true copy. Attest:

F. W. Cook, Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to use granite and natural stone in the construction of public buildings

Whereas the Federal Government is contemplating an extensive Public Works program, under which many public buildings will be erected throughout the United States; and

Whereas the granite industry is a great industry in the State; it is not now prosperous, due to the prolonged curtailment of building and construction; most of the granite workers of our State are now unemployed and many are on relief; and

Whereas the greater portion of the cost of finished granite and stone is incurred by labor; and
Whereas the quality and durability of granite and stone buildings unquestionably excels that of buildings constructed of inferior materials; and ferior materials; and

Whereas from the standpoint of economy and prudent policy it is advisable that lasting and durable materials be used in the construction of public buildings: Now, be it therefore Resolved by the Senate of the State of Maine (the house of representatives concurring), That Congress be respectfully urged and petitioned to enact legislation or to otherwise take appropriate action to require that granite and natural stone be used in the construction of public buildings to be erected under the publicworks program: and that the secretary of state be instructed to works program; and that the secretary of state be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the President, Vice President, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and to the Members of Congress from the State of Maine.

In senate chamber February 21, 1935. Read and adopted, sent down for concurrence.

ROYDEN V. BROWN, Secretary.

House of representatives, read and adopted in concurrence February 22, 1935.

HARVEY R. PEASE, Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

A concurrent resolution to memorialize the Congress of the United States to lower the present tariff rates and to foster and en-courage international trade

Whereas it is the sense of this general assembly that the tariff rates on certain classes of goods are so high that they constitute barriers of trade between other nations and our own; that it would be to the advantage of our Nation, as well as to the nations with whom we trade, to increase the volume of our foreign trade, and thus create a market for products of our fields and factories; and we believe that no one factor would contribute more to this end than the reduction of the tariff rates on certain classes of goods;

Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring). That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to give consideration to the question of tariff rates with a view to revising downward such tariffs as may be found to exist, and to promote, encourage, and foster our trade with foreign nations where the same may be done without in any manner impairing our economic safeguards.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each clerk of the two Houses of Congress, to each Senator from this State, and to each Member of the House of Representatives from this State.

Adopted February 7, 1935. House concurrence February 8, 1935.

A true copy.

JAMES H. FOWLES, Clerk of South Carolina Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on

Senate Concurrent Resolution 6

Whereas in Texas today there are several thousand men who, during the World War, gave up their time and a great sacrifice to their families, as well as themselves, to fight in a war to make this world safe for democracy; and

Whereas there are thousands of these ex-soldiers in Texas today who are facing starvation, poverty, and want because of the economic situation which is slowly adjusting itself throughout Texas and the United States; and

Whereas these ex-soldiers rendered to the State of Texas and the nomic situation which is slowly adjusting itself throughout Texas and the United States; and

Whereas these ex-soldiers rendered to the State of Texas and the United States Government a service that cannot be valued; and

Whereas the United States Congress has appropriated millions of dollars to assist railroads, insurance companies, banks, and big business in the United States; and

Whereas the United States Government executed a loan to foreign nations of Europe to pay the debts of these foreign countries, both to their ex-soldiers and to others; and

Whereas the Federal Government, out of respect for and in honor of the great service rendered by the patriotic men of the United States, has adopted a policy providing for adjusted-service certificates for ex-service men: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That we memorialize the United States Senators and Congressmen from Texas to support a plan for the immediate cash payment of ex-service men's adjusted certificates during the present session of Congress; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to each Member of Congress from Texas.

Signed and approved February 23, 1935.

Governor of Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Concurrent resolution to petition the Congress of the United States to provide by law, as a measure of emergency relief and to promote the economic and social rehabilitation of the island of Puerto Rico, that the taxes filed and levied by H. R. 3835, approved May 12, 1933, to relieve the prevailing national economic emergency by increasing the agricultural purchasing power, be levied, collected, and covered into the Treasury by the customs authorities of Puerto Rico in the same form and manner as provided by the organic act establishing a civil government in Puerto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, to form a special fund in the insular treasury, which fund shall only be expended by the legislature to meet urgent needs and to promote the general welfare of the Puerto Rican community, and for other purposes

Whereas in the economic crisis from which it is suffering, Puerto Rico lacks the financial means to provide relief for the hardships caused by unemployment and the conditions arising therefrom, to overcome economic difficulties, to alleviate disasters, and to improve overcome economic difficulties, to alleviate disasters, and to improve living and labor conditions;

Whereas on May 12, 1933, the Congress of the United States passed Resolution 3835, entitled "An act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes";

Whereas section 9 of said Resolution 3835 provides that, for the purpose of obtaining revenues to cover the extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the national economic emergency, processing taxes be levied on basic agricultural products, including wheat, cotton, field corn, pork products, rice, tobacco, milk and its products, and any regional or market classification, type, or grade thereof;

whereas Puerto Rico is a Territory, organized but not incorporated, governed by a special organic act promulgated by the Congress of the United States, and is also a heavy consumer of such basic agricultural products, that pays said taxes that are not only a heavy burden on Puerto Rican citizens but are the principal cause of the rise in the cost of living, by more than 100 percent, which taxes are covered into the Federal Treasury, and which, if they were reimbursed to insular funds, would provide the means for establishing a special fund for remedying economic difficulties and would be the basis for promoting the general welfare;

Whereas Puerto Rico is oppressed by the weight of an unprecedented economic crisis that has brought about unemployment that involves more than 400,000 persons; its borrowing capacity is exhausted by an insular and municipal public debt amounting to more than $49,000,000; the sources of taxes are limited; and some works of collective utility and aggrandizement are paralyzed and others are being developed slowly, all of which make it necessary for the legislature to petition the Congress of the United States for an urgent and necessary remedy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the Senate of Puerto Rico concurring)—

Rico concurring)

Rico concurring)—
SECTION 1. To petition the Congress of the United States to provide by law, as a measure of emergency relief and to promote the economic and social rehabilitation of the island of Puerto Rico, that the taxes fixed and levied by H. R. 3835, approved May 12, 1933, to relieve the prevailing national economic emergency by increasing the agricultural purchasing power, be levied, collected, and covered into the treasury by the customs authorities of Puerto Rico at the time such products are imported, in the same form and manner as provided by the organic act establishing a civil government in Puerto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, to form a special fund in the insular treasury, which fund shall only be expended by the legislature for the following purposes:

1. To increase the fund for the construction of municipal roads

1. To increase the fund for the construction of municipal roads necessary for the transportation of agricultural products to local and outside markets. For this fund there is a tax of 7 cents a gallon on gasoline imported into, or produced or sold in, Puerto Rico, which amounts annually to the sum of $1,400,000, covering a plan for 1,500 kilometers out of a total of 7,000 kilometers of municipal roads in the island of Puerto Rico;

2. To finish the plan of insular roads, amounting to 45, and to maintain them. More than $20,000,000 of the public debt of Puerto Rico, represented by bond issues for which the good faith of the people of Puerto Rico is pledged, have been expended on this means of communication;

3. For attentions of the insular and municipal public debt amounting to more than $49,000,000, which hinders all progress and aggrandizement of the Puerto Rican community;

4. To furnish funds to the homestead division of the department of labor, and to further the plans prescribed by the Legislature of Puerto Rico for the establishment of workmen's settlements and agricultural farms, and which plans are arrested by the economic crisis that oppresses us, a work that is the most important for social and human aggrandizement undertaken since 1919 by the people of Puerto Rico;

5. To rehabilitate all agricultural districts, principally the coffee areas, which, due to low prices, loss of markets, and disasters from which Puerto Rico has suffered in these latter years, have had to be exempted by the insular legislation from the payment of taxes, which has not only affected its budgets but has also forced it to dispose of surpluses and special funds to aid the affected municipalities which have been rendered unable to attend to their public

6. To continue the plan for the utilization of water resources, for the establishment of irrigation districts and the generation of power and light, as a basis also for the industrialization of the island, since, as Puerto Rico has no coal mines, electricity island, since, as Puerto Ricco has no coal mines, electricity is the white coal on which rests the future progress and aggrandizement of the Puerto Rican community. The insular government, by legislative action, has devoted large sums to this work, represented by issues of bonds that affect the good faith of the people of Puerto Rico, since, by amendments passed by the Congress of the United States, such issues affect the borrowing capacity of the

7. To promote measures to improve the municipal situation, health, and public education, to afford means of livelihood and work, and to meet urgent needs for the welfare of all the people of Puerto Rico;

of Puerto Rico;
8. To attend to the services of insular sanitation and charity.
SEC. 2. That after this resolution is passed copies hereof, certified by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives, be sent to the following persons:
The honorable President of the United States;
The Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the United States;
The Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate of the United States;
The Chairman of the Committee on Lyncher Affairs of the House

The Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States;
The Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington;

The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

SEC. 3. This resolution shall take effect immediately after it is easied by both houses of the legislature of the people of Puerto
